Therefore, it is small wonder that I was told by a senior police officer in my constituency today that he heard one young offender who was well known to the police say, "How many more chances do I get?" That trend has been underpinned, if such is the right word, by section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which does not allow magistrates sufficient leeway to take into account previous convictions. Lord Chief Justice Taylor said:

"Members of the public may feel that if someone commits 135 offences of a particular kind, it is somewhat strange if judges can only take account of one of them as well as the one they are sentencing on."

Section 63 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 also removed the option of sending people who were 15 to youth offender institutions.

What should be done to rectify the problem? Let us be positive, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because that is what the public expect us to be. First, section 63 ought to be reformed so that people of 15 years of age or even younger can be given custodial sentences, and rigorous custodial sentences at that. Secondly, section 29 of the Act ought to be reformed in line with the position in Scotland, where before conviction pre-sentencing reports are prepared which include details of the offender's previous offences. Such reports should be available to the judge or the magistrates.

I am delighted that the Government are planning secure training places now. The Government should provide a continuum of further penalties for older young offenders in secure accommodation. New guidelines on cautioning are expected. They cannot come too soon.

The main point that I want to bring to your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House is that the regime for punishment of juvenile offenders must be much stricter than it is at present. There is no doubt that attendance centres are uneven in their availability to magistrates in sentencing young people. They cater for people under 16 for a maximum of 24 hours. I visited an attendance centre in Droitwich recently. Attendance centres are mild in the extreme. They rely on exhortation and a little physical exercise, but sadly, given the cautioning policy, they are now dealing, according to the police officers who run them, with much more hardened criminals than used to be the case, so their usefulness is commensurately reduced.

Community service orders apply for between 40 and 240 hours. Too often I have heard them described—it is also my evidence—as a sort of mild, lukewarm version of the Duke of Edinburgh award scheme. Frequently there are no educational requirements, so that they are not oriented towards the national vocational qualification. Small wonder that 30 per cent. of those who attended them in 1991 breached the orders.

We know that youth offender institutions have spare capacity, but they must be much more rigorous. It is not sufficient for youngsters to go to those institutions and have only 15 hours of education—the recently recommended Home Office standard. Nor is it enough for young people to go to them to do just five hours a week of physical exercise.

If those institutions are to be deterrents—if they are to represent a greater constructive deterrence than the short, sharp shock detention regimes of the early 1980s—young people must stay at them far longer than 30 days, which is effectively the minimum, and too often common practice. When they go there, they must find slightly more rigour than those I visited, which would not do much harm to a minor public school.

If they are to be real deterrents, the prison officers and social workers in them must be told that not only will there be rehabilitation, not only will there be a continuum of education from what was being done in the youth offender institution before release—post-release work is obviously important—but that they must be rigorous and unpleasant, and, as a result, the word must go round in the persistent offending community that they are places one goes to at one's peril and to which one does not want to return in a hurry.

Having made those proposals for greater rigour in our sentencing regime—at attendance centres, for community service orders and at youth offender institutions—I must point out the appalling fact that, according to the latest figures, only two in every 100 offences result in a criminal conviction. So when criminal convictions are obtained, they must be rigorous and act as a deterrent.

While I appreciate that the rehabilitation of young offenders will involve understanding, too often that form of understanding has been misread by young people in this country as a means of justifying their position—a justification of why they are offending and therefore an excuse for it. If we take the sort of initiatives that I have outlined, some of which the Government are already taking, we shall make the punishment inherent in the criminal justice regime for young people much more rigorous, so enabling us to restore confidence in the system for the British people as a whole.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): I wish at the outset to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) on securing this debate on a very important subject. I underline and endorse the concerns he expressed about juvenile justice.

I also congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) and for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) for being in their places at this late hour to add their support. I appreciate that my near parliamentary neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley, has been a stalwart campaigner on the matter, and he conveys the rigour of his commitment to the cause to the House tonight, as he has on behalf of his constituents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest began by talking about public anxiety over the issue. Much as I have sympathy, as I shall illustrate in practical terms, with much of what he said, juvenile justice is an intensely complex area.

We should not try to act as apologists for the wrongdoing of the young criminals. Many of them are very young, however, and I know that my hon. Friend would agree that, when one visits the institutions in which they are incarcerated, one realises that they may have suffered from physical or sexual abuse, and that they may not have had a loving relationship with their parents. They may not have received the guidance that would have kept them from their wrongdoing.

My hon. Friend is right to talk about rigour, but I hope that he will couple that with effectiveness. It is important that we should consider what we are trying to achieve, under whatever rigorous regime we impose. Our ultimate aim must be to communicate to such young people that they should not go back into society and reoffend. The track record of ensuring that reoffending is kept at a suitably low rate has not been good.

My hon. Friend referred to the difficult issue of statistics. Time does not permit me to underline some of the calculations to which my hon. Friend referred and which ACPO made in an attempt to demonstrate the size of the problem. There is no difference between any commentators, however, when we come to discuss the marked persistency of reoffending among young people.

The number of juveniles known to have committed crimes has fallen sharply in the past decade. In 1991, those under the age of 18 comprised 17 per cent. of known offenders compared with 25 per cent. in 1985 and 26 per cent. in 1981. What seems to be the case, however, is that those young people who offend tend to offend more often. Between 1980 and 1990, the number of findings of guilt per offender aged between 14 and 16 sentenced in court rose from 1·7 to 2. Those statistics underline the point that my hon. Friend was right to make: that persistence must be the number one priority that we address.

It is good to be able to reply to the debate in the knowledge that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is committed to introducing, at the earliest opportunity, a secure training order, which will target the persistent juvenile offender. We have been left in no doubt by hon. Members, police officers and others that tackling those offenders, who have caused so much mayhem and havoc to our constituents, must be our number one priority.

My right hon. and learned Friend hopes that it will not be too long before the courts are provided with that new sentence. It is designed to be available for 12 to 15-year-olds who have been convicted of three imprisonable offences and who have proved unwilling or unable to comply with the requirements of supervision in the community while on remand or under sentence. The court would be empowered to impose such a sentence only when it was satisfield that that order was necessary to protect the public from further offending by a juvenile, and when a place in a suitable facility was available.

Those caveats do not diminish the effect that we hope to achieve, but they show that, by concentrating on such a sentence, we look to it to deal rigorously with the persistent offender—the person who, to put it bluntly, has not come to heel.

My hon. Friend referred to the education that is available in young offender institutions. A key part of the new regime would concentrate on the education and training that an offender may lack. The regime is designed to get at the heart of an offender's behaviour. We will give ourselves sufficient time in which to do that because a secure training order will be imposed for a minimum of six months or up to two years. For a young person between the age of 12 and 15, that represents the possibility of his liberty being removed for an extremely long time. Moreover, I have visited a number of institutions that deal with juveniles under lock and key, and they certainly could not be described as holiday camps or pleasant places to go to.

Many of the places that I have visited that deal with section 53 young offenders are spartan, have rigorous regimes and are not entirely pleasant. But they have one thing in common—they try to concentrate on educating the juveniles and getting to the heart of the offending behaviour. Our regime is different, because it will focus on the problems of the persistent juvenile offender. I can assure my hon. Friend that it is our earnest intention to provide up to 200 such places as soon as we can to enable the persistent juvenile offender to be dealt with. I hope that that reassures him.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Is my hon. Friend hopeful that he will gain the support of the Opposition? They seemed to undergo a conversion to law and order recently, but does not my hon. Friend find it amazing that there is not a single Labour Member or a single Liberal Democrat present for tonight's debate on an extremely important subject?

Mr. Jack: I join my hon. Friend is saying that it is disappointing that the Opposition Benches are utterly deserted this evening. I have found it difficult to obtain an unequivocal endorsement of our policy proposal. I have challenged the Opposition from the Dispatch Box on a number of occasions and, sadly, they have not given a clear and ringing endorsement of our policy. They have their own version of the policy, but it is not ours and it is not focused on the needs of the persistent juvenile offender. That is something that we have done, but they have not.

It is important to consider the effectiveness of the policy. I acknowledge that we need to do more work when we consider the statistics of juvenile crime. But in sectors where research has been conducted, such as the Hereford and Worcester young offenders project, it has been found that, of those who went into custody, 86 per cent. reoffended, whereas 67 per cent. of those on community supervision reoffended.

I am not proud that 67 per cent. of the latter reoffended, and more work needs to be done in that sphere, but there is a measurable and significant difference between the effectiveness of placing people in custody and punishing people in the community. While more work needs to be done on improving the effectiveness—the new national standards that we have introduced into the probation service will lend an enhanced rigour to the punishment—we must remain aware of the fact that there is a significant difference in the reoffending rate of those who go into custody.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: I advise my hon. Friend to be careful when drawing such a conclusion from the reoffending rates of those who go into custody for the simple reason that, with the current regime on cautioning and sentencing, the sort of young people who progress all the way to custody are so imbued with the ways of life of habitual crime that they are likely to reoffend in any event.

Mr. Jack: I understand my hon. Friend's point, but I hope that, in concentrating my remarks on what the secure training order will achieve, I can show him that we are trying to address the problem that he mentioned.

My hon. Friend also mentioned cautioning. I agree that we must not undervalue cautioning as a first point of contact with the criminal justice system. Only 3 per cent. of cautions are given to juveniles who have already had two or more cautions. There has been a feeling that cautions are given out like sweets, but that is not so. Some 87 per cent. of those cautioned in 1985 were not convicted within two years. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I are looking carefully at possible ways in which cautioning as a first encounter can be improved by attaching certain conditions.

It is important to recognise that 87 per cent. of those cautioned in 1985 were not convicted within two years of the caution. Sometimes a caution can be a useful shock to the system, to promote an attitude of "so far and no further". We take that matter seriously.

My hon. Friend mentioned attendance centres. I have also visited an attendance centre. When one considers the raw material with which attendance centres and probation centres have to deal, it becomes clear that such people are not the easiest with which to work. For somebody aged 12, 13 or 14, the attendance centre represents deprivation of liberty, and it is probably the first time that they have had to remain in one place for a period.

There is the rigour of physical activity and a skill such as woodwork to occupy them. It is a first encounter with some form of custody. For those young people, it can be a useful reminder of what could come next if they do not learn some lessons in discipline. We are looking at ways and means of improving the regime in attendance centres, and the points raised by my hon. Friend will serve well to assist those working in them.

My hon. Friend mentioned expanding the range of juvenile disposals. We are looking at the scope and scale of offences covered by section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 to see whether certain offences should be brought into the range of custodial disposals.

My hon. Friend went on to discuss the Criminal Justice Act 1991. I hope that he will know from the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend that we intend to take on board the views of right hon. and hon. Members, particularly on matters relating to section 29 of the Act. I am sure that my hon. Friend will see the Home Secretary's recent statements as confirmation of that.

My hon. Friend mentioned regimes in young offender institutions. I counsel him to go to the Nightingale unit at Feltham. He will find that it is not a particularly pleasant place. However, he will find 15 hours of education and five hours of physical activity. He will also find guidance and counselling on alcoholism and drugs and other activities that bring a rigour to the regime there in not particularly pleasant surroundings. Anger control is also addressed. A real attempt is made to deal with some of the most difficult offenders that one will find, some having committed some of the worst crimes in the country. My hon. Friend will not find a holiday camp atmosphere at Feltham—far from it. Instead, there is a determination to get hold of those young people in order to give them some rigour and discipline to enable them to go back into society and not reoffend again.

Finally, the short, sharp shock treatment to which my hon. Friend referred briefly was not particularly successful as 75 per cent. of the people reoffended. We are trying to introduce young people to some of the rigours of prison, a scheme presently existing on trial to enable some people to sample——

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

Standard Assessment Tasks

1. Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many schools he has received representations from urging him to make this year's SATs voluntary; and what proportion this is of the total number of schools in the state system.

4. Mr. Wells: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will direct the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority to consider simplifying tests at seven, 11 and 14 years of age on the principle of establishing tests that take minimal teacher and pupil time while being effective measures of achievement of basic skills.

The Secretary of State for Education (Mr. John Patten): Since the beginning of the year, the Department has received about 6,500 letters about testing, making many different points. I have asked Sir Ron Dearing to review the national curriculum and assessment framework with the aim of simplifying it while retaining the key features of clear teaching objectives, regular tests and high standards. I shall, with permission, make a statement about further arrangements later today.

Mrs. Roche: Given the widespread opinion among parents, school governors, teachers and his own advisers, why cannot the Secretary of State give a clear and unambiguous commitment to withdraw those fatally flawed tests this year?

Mr. Patten: The tests to which the hon. Lady has referred—for example, the tests for seven-year-olds—have been proceeding satisfactorily since 1991. They were taken again in 1992. In most primary schools up and down the land, they have been successfully completed already.

Mr. Wells: May I urge my right hon. Friend to continue and to persist with testing? Surely the original idea was that the tests should be short, sharp and easily marked, and that they would lead to a proper assessment of the place that each child had reached. There would then be possibilities of remedial action and teaching could be accelerated to higher standards for those able to achieve them. Is not that the objective?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the great Education Reform Act 1988, our whole aim was to begin to catch up with our competitors who had had national curricula and assessment regimes for many decades. It is the Government's intention to continue to catch up as rapidly as possible with our international competitors, while making the national curriculum and the associated testing arrangements as slim and manageable as possible—a process which we have already started with the tests for seven-year-olds.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Will the Secretary of State tell us how many of those 6,500 letters were in favour of the Government's arrangements for testing? Does he recall my advice to him in Education Question Time on 17 November, when I suggested that he should consult his Scottish ministerial colleagues and listen to their explanation of how they had established a system of assessment that enjoyed the confidence of parents and teachers? Why is the Scottish system so unacceptable to English Ministers? Does the Secretary of State's arrogance stretch to his ministerial colleagues? Did he hear the Prime Minister say that Ministers should curb their arrogance? To which Cabinet Ministers does he think the Prime Minister was referring?

Mr. Patten: Two things about that: The 6,500 letters that we have received since the beginning of the year contain a wide range of views because—[Interruption.] No—listen, listen. Would the hon. Lady be good enough to listen? The letters contain a wide range of views because anything at all concerning testing, assessment or the curriculum always attracts a wide range of strong and passionate concerns. One is always going to get that and I welcome it because I think that the country needs a great debate on education. The more the general public who are interested and concerned want to write in giving their points of view, the more I welcome it.

I was asked a second question, which I must answer briefly, Madam Speaker. In Scotland, they do not have a Education Reform Act or a statutory national curriculum. The system in Scotland as far as education is concerned is as different as the situation in Scotland is concerned as far as law is concerned where they have a Roman law system.

Sir Malcolm Thornton: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that a significant proportion of the letters that his Department has received about testing related to key stage 3 testing, and that much of the evidence on key stage 1 testing—which is now in force in many of our schools and which has been reformed in the light of experience over the past three years—suggests that it is now beginning to bring benefits, as recent Her Majesty's inspectorate reports have shown? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, in this whole debate, the principle of testing is not negotiable but is an integral part of the Government's reforms?

Mr. Patten: There is not an inch between my hon. Friend and me on the issue of testing. I can certainly confirm that a number of the 6,500 letters were about key stage 3 testing. Many more were about key stage 1 testing at age seven. I must tell my hon. Friend and the House that we are awaiting the results of a ballot held by the National Union of Teachers, which wishes to stop, not only this year but next year, teaching at all levels; I am so sorry, it wishes to stop testing at all levels—at seven, 11 and 14—not only in 1993 but in 1994, including those very successful tests for seven-year-olds which Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools yesterday commended when he launched the Office for Standards in Education's five-year corporate plan.

Mr. Steinberg: Does the Secretary of State agree that, given that the tests have proved to be flawed, that the vast majority of teachers propose to boycott them and that parents are totally against them, the tests really cannot go ahead? If the Secretary of State finds that he cannot get his own way—due to his arrogance—will he introduce legislation to force teachers to carry out the tests?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman must wait and see what is in the Queen's speech this year, next year or the year after. The hon. Gentleman has a perfectly legitimate interest, which he has declared, in the NUT. I can tell him that I have had his friend Mr. McAvoy in for a cup of tea in my Department to discuss these issues. Mr. McAvoy —who, I can reveal, I actually quite like personally, although I disagree with him profoundly on professional matters—has told me that he is totally against regular testing of children at key stages year by year and totally against the publication of results school by school.

English

2. Mr. Brandreth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations he has received from the Queen's English Society on the teaching of spoken English; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patten: I have received no direct representations from the Queen's English Society, but I know that the society was one of the bodies whose evidence the National Curriculum Council took into account in framing its recent recommendations for changes to the national curriculum English, which I warmly welcome.

We believe that the proposals that we published for consultation on 15 April will help to ensure that pupils develop confidence and competence in their use of spoken English, and, more generally, will raise expectations and standards in the subject, which is critically important.

Mr. Brandreth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Queen's English has nothing to do with accent and everything to do with communication? Is he aware that recently the business community has reckoned that problems with literacy and numeracy are costing industry some £4·8 billion a year and that business is crying out for the Government to do something about literacy, numeracy and communication skills for our young people?

Mr. Patten: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's points, made with his characteristically clear diction, in standard English throughout. My hon. Friend is quite right. We have been told by the adult literacy and basic skills unit that the cost to industry of young people going in without adequate skills and without being able to express themselves is between £4 billion and £5 billion a year. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House can agree that it is critically clear that, when youngsters leave school and make job applications, they are able to make those applications in clear written English and that they are able to answer questions in interviews in the clearest possible way. That is why the speaking of standard English is so important and why I welcome the views of the society.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is the Secretary of State aware that those of us who were never learnt to speak English proper certainly do not lack the intellectual ability to discern that in these issues, as in many others, the Secretary of State is a complete Gombeen—that is an Irish expression—and nor do we lack the ability to communicate those issues? When we have a Secretary of State—I appreciate that he is a little nervous today—who tells the House about "a education" and "Mr. McAvoy who I met in my office", he is in no position to begin to educate young people up and down the country on the benefits of standard English or, indeed, any other way of communicating properly and adequately in the English language.

Mr. Patten: Not for the first time in answering the hon. Gentleman's questions, I am completely confused because of his failure to put them clearly. All that I can say is that it is critically important for all of us to be able to express ourselves as clearly as possible, as the Hansard report of what I have said will make clear tomorrow and as anyone who is listening will have heard. I hope that the hon. Gentleman shares with me—I did not understand the Irish expression that he used—the necessity for anyone applying for a job, whether they are 16, 17, 18 or any age, to express themselves clearly in standard English. That is why standard English and the recommendations of the National Curriculum Council are so important.

Universities (Tuition Fees)

3. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he monitors the promptness of payments of tuition fees by local authorities to universities.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education (Mr. Tim Boswell): Local education authorities have a statutory duty to pay tuition fees promptly by the dates specified in the Mandatory Awards Regulations. The Department takes action on any evidence of failure to comply.

Mr. Batiste: Is my hon. Friend aware that last year a number of local authorities were late in passing on tuition fees, which they had received from the Government, to universities and that there is some evidence that that pattern has been repeated this year? Is it not entirely wrong that higher education should be denied funds because of late payment by local authorities? Is it not time that the Government thought about the way in which money could be transferred direct to universities without going through the post box of local government?

Mr. Boswell: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is most unsatisfactory if payments are not made in time. It is not even in the interests of the local authorities, because they do not get interest on the money, which is lodged in a special account with the Paymaster General. It is sometimes a matter of administrative complication or failure. We most vigorously investigate those cases in which, under the existing award system, it is apparently impossible for them to pay on time, as they should.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister find out why the problem does not arise in Scotland and see whether he can apply the lessons learnt there to the situation in England? Will he accept from me that, the last time I checked, universities were owed almost £100 million after the date on which payment was due? One in five local authorities is a late payer, and some local authorities pay the fees for the second term before the fees for the first term. Any half-awake local authority treasurer who is handed, effectively, control of millions of pounds of central Government funds to pass on without any penalty for late payment will work that money for his or her employer or local authority. Is it not time that some sort of interest penalty was placed on the late payment of tuition fees and at the same time, while we are thinking about it, an interest penalty paid for the late payment of mandatory award grants to students, who suffer just as badly?

Mr. Boswell: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's comments about Scotland, have taken note of them and am aware of the situation there. We have improved the system in England. There is no advantage to local authorities, because the money lodged to their credit by the due date does not attract interest in their hands. We watch carefully for failures to pay and will tighten that up. He also mentioned the more general issue of student grants and I am concerned about any that are not paid on time. They are, or they should be, paid early in, or at the beginning of, term and that is one reason why we leave tuition fees until the end of term, to try to avoid the two becoming confused. We pursue vigorously authorities that fail to pay. There are fewer than there were, but there are still too many.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Is my hon. Friend aware that now that the county elections are behind us, it is rumoured that Lancashire county council is proposing to abolish the appeals procedure for students seeking discretionary grants? Is not that grossly unfair to the students and further evidence of its arrogance, which has been allowed to surface now that the elections are over?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend goes wider still—the nature of discretion is that it has to be exercised. I shall take a dim view of any local authority that removes its discretion by saying that it will not consider payment in a certain case.

Surplus School Places

6. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how his Department determines whether a local authority has an apparent surplus of primary school and secondary school places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Patten: The Department for Education conducted a survey of surplus capacity in 1991, comparing the total capacity of schools in each authority with total pupil numbers. We are consulting local education authorities on the scope for reducing that surplus, taking into account demographic and other changes since the survey.

Mr. Gapes: Is the Secretary of State aware that if he moved to Ilford, South and had an eight-year-old son or daughter in year four, he would not be able to get a place for his child in seven of the 10 schools in my constituency, and in three schools he would get a place only for a catchment area child? Highlands school in Cranbrook ward has 36 children in two classes and Christchurch primary and infant school has 35 children in every class from reception to year six. What is he going to do about it? Why is Redbridge council considering putting Portakabins on a building site to deal with the problem, yet the Government refused to allow the council to build the school that is needed in my constituency?

Mr. Patten: I appreciate the hon. Member's strength of feeling on behalf of his constituents. A basic needs formula is applied by my Department to make new school building possible when there is an established need for extra places. His question demonstrates how critically important it is for us to get to grips with the fact that there are many hundreds of thousands of surplus school places, where money is being spent on roofs and not on educating children. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support me in our campaign to ensure that those surplus places are wrung out of the system, so that money can be transferred from where it is being wasted to where it may be needed —it is up to the hon. Gentleman's local authority to make the case.

Mr. Dickens: Can the Secretary of State tell the House whether he thinks that the criteria are working, in the sense that if there are places within a 2-mile radius of an overcrowded school, it is prohibited from being rebuilt on a new site? Our hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth), the Under-Secretary of State for Schools, has been dealing with Holy Trinity county primary school in Dobcross, in the hills of Saddleworth. In winter 2 miles is a long way to bus children in Saddleworth, although 2 miles on the flat in an urban area is not far at all.

Mr. Patten: As my hon. Friend knows, I visited Saddleworth, at his invitation, in the winter and I know what it is like. In applying any criteria for catchment areas to schools there is a dilemma. On all occasions, we must take two things into account: first, in the interests of rural communities, we must preserve small rural schools with large catchment areas; secondly, we must make it possible for popular schools to expand. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and I have been most concerned to make advances on the latter in recent months and we hope to make announcement in the not-too-distant future.

Education Spending, Humberside

7. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the standard spending assessment for education in Humberside for each of the last two years.

Mr. Boswell: Humberside's education standard spending assessment rose by some 16 per cent. to £321 million in 1991-92 and to more than £342 million, including the additional grant for teachers' pay, in 1992-93—a rise of some 24 per cent. in two years. Its education standard spending assessment for 1993-94 is more than £305 million —an underlying increase of 1·8 per cent. allowing for the transfer of responsibility for most further education expenditure to the new funding council.

Mr. Mitchell: I thank the Minister for those statistics. Does he accept that the increase in Humberside's education SSA has been less than the national increase, resulting in the past three years in a cumulative loss of £3·5 million to the county? Does he further accept that Humberside's spending last year of more than 8 per cent.

over its SSA to give kids a bit better education has had to be cut because of the threat of budget capping? As a result of cutting the improvement over SSA, every school in Grimsby is losing between one and seven teachers and faces classes that much larger. Every child in Grimsby will receive an education that much worse than it should be. Does the Minister regard that as acceptable?

Mr. Boswell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware from his local knowledge that the number of pupils in Humberside is static. The national numbers show a 1·2 per cent. increase in the current year. The difference in funding reflects that specific fact. If the hon. Gentleman does not like the present formula, it is open to him at any stage to suggest an alternative formula to my colleagues in the Department of the Environment. If he can find a formula that commands universal acceptance, including among his colleagues, he will be a clever man indeed. The present formula seeks to balance all the factors in the fairest possible way between local education authorities.

Mr. Michael Brown: Is not the real position that Humberside county council simply does not know how to manage its budget? In neighbouring Lincolnshire, the local authority under Conservative control—[Interruption.]—at least until last Thursday, was able, and I hope will still be able, to deliver education to the people of Lincolnshire with more resources. Does my hon. Friend agree that in Lincolnshire a higher proportion of expenditure previously went on education than is likely to be the case under the new arrangements in Lincolnshire?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is precisely right as usual. I am sure that the good work done previously by Lincolnshire county council will stand to its advantage when it is remembered in due course.

English

8. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what measures he is taking to improve standards in the teaching of English in schools.

11. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about the proposals for the revision of English in the national curriculum.

Mr. Patten: The new proposals for English, which I published together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales on 15 April, aim to simplify, streamline and strengthen the present curriculum by defining more clearly the essential skills which English teaching should promote and reducing the number of requirements to be satisfied. We believe that the proposals will provide a firmer structure to ensure that pupils acquire knowledge and understanding of the English language, grammar and vocabulary, as well as the ability to speak it with confidence. They should also ensure that pupils learn about their literary heritage and study the works of our greatest writers.

In the light of consultation on our proposals in England and Wales, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I expect to publish a draft order for a revised English curriculum later in the year for further statutory consultation.

Mr. Coombs: In view of the difficulties in reading and writing experienced by a significant minority of 14-year-olds and 16-year-olds according to the National Curriculum Council and given the streamlining of the English curriculum mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, does he agree with Sir Ron Dearing and Stewart Sutherland that it is crucial that tests for 14-year-olds in English go ahead this year? Does he further agree that it is craven almost to the extent of Pontius Pilate for the Opposition to argue in favour of tests on principle while refusing to condemn the boycott of the tests by many teachers which would damage the tests so badly in practice?

Mr. Patten: To answer the second of my hon. Friend's two questions first, many people say that they are in favour of a national curriculum and testing but are afraid to come forward and set out exactly what they mean. That behaviour has been characteristic of the Opposition throughout the past year.

On my hon. Friend's first point, testing is critical not just for 14-year-olds but for seven-year-olds. As Sir Ron Dearing and Professor Stewart Sutherland, Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, said yesterday, the testing of seven-year-olds has not only led to some improvements and a greater expectation among teachers of what they can expect from their children, but demonstrated that two out of three children aged seven cannot read the simplest words. It is those children who need to be helped throughout their school careers and that is why we need the testing regime that we have introduced.

Mr. Thomason: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it is totally unacceptable that 30 per cent. of 16-year-olds are unable to master the basic reading skills expected of people of that age? Will he ensure that under the national curriculum, to which he referred a moment ago, the proper teaching of English is introduced?

Mr. Patten: It is entirely right that the National Curriculum Council recommendations should concentrate to a greater extent on the basics—standard English, reading and writing. It is always right to reveal problems that have been hidden. It was only in this past year that we discovered, for the first time, that some 300,000 16-year-old school leavers going on to further education had a reading age of 14 years or less. That must be put right and that is why we need the slimmer national curriculum English orders, which are now in draft. That is why we need testing and why, and how, we must catch up with our international competitors. In France, for example, the testing of eight and 11-year-olds has gone on for decades.

Mr. Enright: Will the Secretary of State explain how affixing captions to "Pam's Paper pictures" assists in the tests for 14-year-olds? Would he not be better advised to correct the English used by the other Departments of Her Majesty's Government, which send out to us appallingly written documents in appalling numbers?

Mr. Patten: I remember that during our most recent debate on education the hon. Gentleman got into a muddle about the membership of his own union. He could not even remember the name of his union, to which he referred incorrectly. What I can say to the hon. Gentleman —[Interruption.] Order. I think that when the testing of 14-year-olds takes place this summer and the results have been published, some time after those tests have been taken, people will wonder what on earth the fuss was about and they will see exactly what good those tests will do.

Mr. Dafis: The Secretary of State will be aware of the views of the Curriculum Council for Wales on the rather questionable entity of standard English. It strongly disapproves of the principle that children aged six or seven should have their English corrected to bring it into line with the so-called standard form. I wonder whether the Secretary of State would care to congratulate that organisation on its good sense. As part of the process of making the proposed curriculum and assessment authority for Wales genuinely autonomous, will he ensure that the council's recommendations are accepted in Wales?

Mr. Patten: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am not responsible for education in Wales. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is consulting on the draft proposals from the Curriculum Council for Wales and I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's views are drawn to his attention.

Special Needs Education

9. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will take steps to improve the process of statementing children; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): The Education Bill, now in another place, builds on the Education Act 1981, creating a new framework for all children with special educational needs. Pupils who need statements will benefit from many of the new arrangements, including time limits on the making of assessments and statements. We shall issue comprehensive, practical guidance to local education authorities and schools in the form of a code of practice.

Mr. Steen: That is all very well, but is my hon. Friend aware that there are children with special needs in some of the most deprived urban areas who have to wait up to three years before they can be tested because of the philosophical and political views of the local authority, which is opposed to the testing? Will he consider enlarging the powers of the ombudsman so that parents can go direct to the ombudsman, who can then direct local authorities, mostly Labour, to get a move on?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is correct in identifying unacceptable delays in producing statements of special educational needs and also unacceptable variations between authorities. We are well aware of the problems and they are exactly what the Bill, now in another place, will address. We shall issue regulations to put time limits on the statementing process; we shall issue a code of practice to introduce a standard format for statements to ensure that all children are uniformly and properly cared for; and we shall introduce a tribunal to give genuinely independent advice and be an independent source of appeal to parents who feel that they have not been properly treated.

If my hon. Friend looks at what is in our Bill and at the code of practice and tribunals that will follow, he will see that the problems that he has identified will be dealt with fairly and firmly.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Minister accept that, although what he said is likely to produce an improvement in the present situation, which all too often leads to heart-rending difficulties for parents and children, even today a lobby of the House is being organised by the Spastics Society in which several hundred parents will have terrible stories to tell of the stress that they have been caused by the statementing process? Those parents remain dissatisfied with the provisions of the Education Bill, particularly with regard to the resources to meet the needs of any child with a statement. Will the Minister now commit himself to making sure that all local education authorities have the resources to provide for the needs specified in any child's statement?

Mr. Forth: I am very much aware of the views of the Spastics Society and I keep them closely under review. The society has not yet perhaps fully appreciated the advances that the Bill represents. I hope that when it realises what the code of practice and the regulations to follow mean, it will be happier than it now appears to be with that advance.

I believe that local authorities have the right resources to provide for statements and for those children with special needs who are not covered by a statement. The fact that the proportion of children statemented by local educational authorities varies between just over 1 per cent. in some authorities to more than 4 per cent. in others demonstrates that different authorities have taken different views up to now and that parents and their children, therefore, have tended to be treated differently. The Bill will address that problem and will make uniform the content of statements and the approach to be taken. I hope that the Spastics Society and all the other special educational needs interest groups will welcome that when they have reflected on it and seen the full development of our proposals under the Bill.

Grant-maintained Schools

10. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what recent surveys have been conducted into the operation of grant-maintained schools; and what are the main findings.

Mr. Patten: The Grant Maintained Schools Centre published the results of its latest annual survey of self-governing grant maintained schools in November last year. They demonstrate how self-governing schools are benefiting from the freedom to manage their own affairs and control their own budget.

The report by the Office for Standards in Education on 81 grant-maintained schools, published on 30 March, concluded that grant-maintained schools were adapting well to their new framework and were taking advantage of the new opportunities that grant-maintained status offered. The report also noted that grant-maintained schools were attracting increasing numbers of pupils.

There are about 775 grant-maintained schools today, either operating, approved or awaiting approval.

Dr. Fox: Will my right hon. Friend communicate that information to Avon education authority which has sent to parents in schools that wish to become self-governing a politically bigoted letter that amounts to emotional blackmail? Does he agree that that sort of malevolent nonsense is likely to become an ever-greater feature of those councils that came under Labour or Liberal control last week?

Mr. Patten: I understand from papers that my hon. Friend has sent me that schools in the Woodspring constituency, like St. John the Evangelist, are feeling inhibited about going for grant-maintained status because of what they regard as coercion by Labour-controlled Avon council. That is why the Education Bill, presently in another place, will make it possible for at least a substantial amount of the effort that has been put into using council tax payers' funds by councils to intimidate schools to be brought to a halt, and quite right too.

Mrs. Mahon: Has not the Minister been embarking on crude bribery to get schools to opt out? If he denies that, will he explain why, in Calderdale, three grant-maintained schools recently received a capital improvement grant of £450,000 while the other 109 schools had to make do with £223,000? Is that not a straightforward bribe to get schools to opt out?

Mr. Patten: I am sorry that the hon. Lady is displeased that three schools in her area have had such large capital grants. In the past, successful schools, often voluntary-aided schools, have been consistently starved of capital funds that were much needed for modernisation of buildings and expansion. One of the reasons why grant-maintained status is so important is that it allows popular, oversubscribed schools the possibility of expanding, and quite right too.

Dame Angela Rumbold: Does my right hon. Friend agree that many of the schools that have achieved grant-maintained status would like the benefits of that status to be expressed in clear terms? Those schools not only attract more pupils, provide better education by dint of better standards and have rather better teachers, but attract a larger number of people willing to come forward as governors. All those factors should be made clear to the cantankerous Liberal and Labour-controlled authorities.

Mr. Patten: I have two points for my right hon. Friend. First, there are queues of children waiting to go to grant-maintained schools, which are extremely popular. Secondly, although, in comparison with maintained schools, I have visited only a small number of grant-maintained schools, in every one that I have visited, teachers and governors have told me that they relish their new freedom to run their affairs and their schools to their own agenda. That is a central part of the Conservative philosophy on which we were elected at the last general election.

Special Schools

12. Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the number of special schools operating in Manchester local education authority (a) five years ago, (b) last year and (c) currently.

Mr. Forth: Throughout the period in question, there have been 26 special schools and two special units in the Manchester local education authority.

Mr. Eastham: As the Minister is aware, the Government have never met their responsibilities to disabled children under the Education Act 1981. Later this year, more special schools will be closed. Will the Government give the House a firm assurance that they will make sure that there is sufficient money available for lifts, ramps, changing facilities, special toilets, furnishing and laboratory equipment, all of which will be needed for such children? It is one thing to say that we want integration in schools soon, and another to have the money to do the job.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman should talk to his hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench about their attitude to the provision of special schools as opposed to those in the mainstream. It is, and rightly so, for the local education authority—in this case, Manchester—to decide how far it believes that there should be provision in special schools and units or mainstream provision. That is its responsibility and I would look to, and expect, it to discharge that responsibility properly.

Dyslexia

13. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what studies he has made into the treatment of dyslexic children in examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The results of a three-year research project on special educational needs and the GCSE, commissioned by the School Examinations and Assessment Council and undertaken by the centre for assessment studies at Bristol university, is due to report to the council this summer. The research report is expected to address the position of candidates suffering from various disabilities, including dyslexia.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: I understand that there are wide variations in the policies and practices of examination boards in the treatment of dyslexic children. Will the Minister give the House an assurance that their special needs will be recognised, especially in relation to concessions taking into account psychologists' reports so that that untapped talented group of people can achieve its full potential?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend asks an important question. At the moment, the examining groups try, wherever possible, to take the fullest possible account of children with disabilities and difficulties, in particular dyslexia. They try to strike that difficult balance between an examining and testing process that does justice to all pupils and one that takes proper account of those with particular special needs. I will certainly look again at the matter in order to satisfy myself that the examining groups are treating it properly, but I believe that, generally speaking, they have probably got the balance about right.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Pickthall: I thank the Prime Minister and the many Cabinet Ministers who campaigned in Lancashire in recent weeks and helped Labour vastly to increase its vote and achieve a majority on the local council. Was it in Lancashire that the Government heard about the challenging environment that they faced, the big hole that they were in and the bloody nose they were about to get? Did they listen to the people of Lancashire on value added tax, testing in schools, unemployment and the attacks on local democracy? Can the people of Britain expect the Government's supposed listening to the people to be translated into action to rebuild the country, instead of the present policies which are dismantling it?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman clearly deserves an A-level in smugness. Perhaps I may quote something to the hon. Gentleman from The Sunday Times that I have no doubt he will find of interest. The quote, which he may enjoy, reads as follows:

"Conservative set-backs in Thursday's county council elections . . . were so severe that Labour would win the general election on the same voting breakdown."

That was The Sunday Times in 1985. Two years later we won the election with a majority of 100.

Mr. Conway: Is my right hon. Friend feeling cheerful, because he should? Is it not the case that we have every reason to be optimistic because, of all the countries that pulled out of the exchange rate mechanism last autumn, the United Kingdom is the only country to have pulled out of recession?

The Prime Minister: The principal reason Britain has come out of recession is that we have achieved low inflation; because we have got inflation down, we were able to cut 5 per cent. off interest rates—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members on the Bench below the Gangway please desist until we get through Question Time? They can then go outside and have their own singsong.

The Prime Minister: I think that everyone was enjoying it, Madam Speaker. It was because we cut inflation that we were able to take 5 per cent. off interest rates before last September, and because we got inflation down we are now beginning to see a recovery in retail sales and exports since the spring. It is because of that that we shall see greater growth this year and next year than any other country in the European Community.

Mr. John Smith: Can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Budget in November will be presented by the present Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont)?

The Prime Minister: That is a hoary old chestnut of a question. I have not yet even begun to contemplate Cabinet changes. But I will say this: it is because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken difficult decisions that we now have inflation at a 25-year low, interest rates at a 15-year low and prospects of the fastest growth in Europe this year and next year. That is an excellent record which people will recognise long after the right hon. and learned Gentleman's undignified sniping is forgotten.

Mr. Smith: Surely the Prime Minister heard the question quite clearly. It is a simple question: will the present Chancellor present the next Budget? Cannot the Prime Minister say either yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I explained very clearly to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. If I wanted advice on Cabinet making, I would not seek it from the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who last week had to sack his own economic spokesman for incompetence.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Smith: The Prime Minister seems to be having some difficulty with a simple question—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order and not use up time in this way.

Mr. Smith: May I give the Prime Minister a third shot at it? Will the present Chancellor present the Budget? If the Prime Minister cannot say yes, why cannot he say no?

The Prime Minister: Why does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman just admit that he has got a bloody nose? It is a good deal more dignified.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. Friend—as a genuine, listening Prime Minister—will be aware of the alienation expressed in the constituencies last week. He will also be aware of the severe mauling given to the Maastricht treaty by the democratic process. Is he not greatly concerned about the massive alienation that would result if the ratification of this new constitution now depended on the Danes, the Whips and the courts alone?

The Prime Minister: If, as my hon. Friend intimates, the election was really about the Maastricht treaty, it is rather surprising how well some other political parties did.

Mr. Ashdown: After Srebrenica, just as I predicted, there has been Zepa. Does the Prime Minister still insist on doing nothing more to save the tens of thousands of innocents in Gorazde from a similar tragic fate?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is being deeply unfair to the efforts by both this country and a large number of other countries which are working together. The right hon. Gentleman is aware of the difficulties and also of the intense dangers of following some of the actions that he has advocated in the past. He knows what action we are proposing to take; that remains the position and we continue to discuss that and other options with our allies.

Mr. Streeter: Is my right hon. Friend aware that on a recent visit to estate agents in Plympton in my constituency, I found that estate agents could talk of nothing else but a real and significant upturn in the housing market, with house sales increasing and house prices improving week by week? Does my right hon. Friend agree that that reflects a steady return to confidence in this country and represents good news for Plymouth, good news for the country and bad news for the Opposition?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that that is right in every aspect. I have not myself visited estate agents, as I have no intention of moving.

Q2. Mr. Milburn: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Milburn: Does the Prime Minister share his Chancellor's lack of regret about the damage done to the country by his Government? Is not it time that he learned to apologise and to listen to the millions of people who have become the victims of his policies? Has he got time today to tell them what changes in direction he has planned following last week's overwhelming public rejection not only of him and his colleagues but of his Government's policies?

The Prime Minister: I have said before, and from the Dispatch Box, that I understand the difficulties that people have faced as a result of the recession. I have said that clearly. I have also made it clear that I appreciate that it has lasted longer than people anticipated, but it was necessary to bring inflation down, or inflation would have gone on wreaking ever-greater damage for an even longer period. We needed to bring it down; we have brought it down. That is the only secure basis for lasting growth in the future. The fact is that the Labour party would never have had the guts to take the decisions that were necessary.

Economy

Q3. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the state of the economy.

The Prime Minister: It is getting better every day—exports up, manufacturing output up, retail sales up, business confidence up, new housing starts up and gross domestic product up.

Mr. Brown: Is my right hon. Friend aware that that reply is confirmed in Brigg and Cleethorpes, where industrial recovery has resulted in unemployment falling to below the national average where once it was twice the national average? Will he acknowledge the Government support that has resulted in tremendous United States investment through companies such as Kimberly-Clark Ltd. and Paramount Packaging, where many jobs have been created in the last few months? May I advise my right hon. Friend that in Cleethorpes last week Allied Colloids announced that 90 more new jobs would be created?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to welcome investments such as those which represent good news for Humberside. They represent the confidence of inward investors and of British companies in the region. I know how hard my hon. Friend works for his constituents and how much he will welcome those developments.

Ms Estelle Morris: What would the Prime Minister say to the millions of pensioners living just above income support level who thought that his pledge to start listening would mean that the proposal to charge VAT on fuel would be removed?

The Prime Minister: Everyone, including the Opposition Front Bench, as I understand it, agrees that the budget deficit is too high and that we need to bring it down. We have had the courage to produce our proposals, of which VAT is a part, to bring it down. I am surprised that the hon. Lady should raise that after the nonsense talked by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) about VAT last week, when it was clear from one of his economic spokesmen that the Opposition, too, would have increased VAT on a range of items.

Engagements

Q4. Sir Fergus Montgomery: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Has my right hon. Friend seen the report today that housing starts are up 22 per cent. compared with the last quarter? Should not that news bring joy even to the hearts of the dismal Johnnies on the Opposition Benches? Is not that a sign of a return to confidence?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the Opposition are unhappy at good news. They realise that good news today for us is bad news tomorrow for them. Clearly, it shows growing confidence by the building industry in the market for new houses. That is very welcome in view of the difficulties that the construction industry has had. With the measures that the Chancellor took in the autumn statement, the measures that he took in the budget and the reduction in interest rates, there is clearly a much better prospect for the housing market.

Q5. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Connarty: Does not the Prime Minister accept that the bloody nose on Thursday was given to him personally as much as to his Government? Has it improved his listening skills area on the issue of testing children? We are to have a statement later today, but the nation is looking to the Prime Minister to see where he stands. As a Scot, I remember that we went through a period of attrition when the Government tried to force testing on to our country. Thankfully, it is now back in the hands of parents and teachers who care for children, so that test items can be used whenever they want and not compulsorily. Will the Prime Minister tell the House where he stands on the testing of children and the interference of the state in the care of parents and teachers?

The Prime Minister: The answer to the first part of that supplementary question is that, of course, I accept my share of responsibility for the election results last week, in precisely the same way as the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) will accept his share of responsibility for losing the last election. As for education and testing, I will tell the hon. Gentleman precisely where I stand: I stand four square with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Q6. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thomason: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is never popular to increase taxes but it is necessary to balance the books? Does he further agree that the responsibility of the Government contrasts sharply with that of Labour Members, who demand more spending but do not tell us how they would pay for it?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend and, as he indicated, measures are in place to bring down the size of the borrowing requirement. That has required some tough decisions, but, having concluded that that is necessary, the Government have taken those decisions knowing that they cannot be ducked. As my hon. Friend pointed out, the Labour party is in a fundamentally dishonest position—[Interruption.] Opposition Members are committed to spending money, but they will not say where the money is coming from. That is very good for an Opposition but not for a Government, which is why we remain on these Benches and they remain on the Opposition Benches.

Testing (Schools)

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Education (Mr. John Patten): With permission, Madam Speaker, I propose to make a statement about future arrangements for national curriculum testing.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have already confirmed the Government's commitment to this summer's tests for seven and 14-year-olds. There is abundant evidence of the importance of testing the progress of our children. Our main competitor countries do so as a matter of course. So should we. It would be a betrayal of a future generation of pupils—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Patten: Our main competitor countries do so as a matter of course. So should we. It would be a betrayal of a future generation of pupils to postpone what are acknowledged on all sides to be much needed educational reforms. It would be to set aside the tremendous efforts made by the great majority of hard-working teachers to implement the national curriculum since 1989.

Tests for seven-year-olds are in their third year. We know that they work. Tests in 1991 and 1992 have improved standards of teaching and learning. Last year's pilot tests for 14-year-olds were well received. Attendance by pupils actually went up on test days. Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools said only yesterday that the evidence provided by a good testing system was essential to assess the progress of our schools.

Children have been working towards the tests for several years. Abandoning the tests would leave conscientious teachers, concerned parents and the wider community in the dark about our schools, depriving them of vital information about the attainments of individual pupils and denying Sir Ron Dearing the information about the quality of the tests for which he himself has asked.

I come to the testing arrangements for 1994. Sir Ron Dearing has been given the widest possible remit. His task is to advise on how the curriculum and assessment framework in the round can be simplified and streamlined in response to the concerns of many teachers.

I have discussed with Sir Ron the implications for 1994. He has advised me that the tests next year should focus on the basics—exactly why I asked him to set up the review in the first instance. I agree with that advice. The Government have therefore decided on the following for 1994. First, mandatory tests in 1994 for seven and 14-year-olds should concentrate on the core subjects of English, mathematics and science, and on Welsh as a first language in Wales. We shall decide later whether to add technology at the age of 14, in the light of this summer's tests.

Secondly, the testing arrangements in these subjects will be streamlined, with some substantial changes to coverage and style. I have asked Sir Ron Dearing to advise me by July on how this can best be done, including the balance between the tests themselves and teachers' own assessments.

Thirdly, and very importantly, Sir Ron will, at my request, carefully consider the merits of external marking by external examiners of the tests of 11 and 14-year-olds.

Fourthly, the current obligation on teachers of seven-year-olds to make assessments of class room work in technology, history and geography will be lifted in 1994 and will not be introduced in music, art and physical education, allowing those teachers to concentrate on the basics.

Fifthly, next year's tests for 11-year-olds in English, mathematics and science will take the form of a national pilot, leading to mandatory tests in 1995.

Sixthly, the introduction of mandatory tests for 14-year-olds in history and geography which had been planned for 1994 will be postponed, pending Sir Ron Dearing's review.

Seventhly, to ensure that Sir Ron Dearing's recommendations about changes to the curriculum can be rapidly implemented, which is what many of my right hon. and hon. Friends want, the Government propose to suspend for a period the consultation procedures specified in sections 20 and 21 of the Education Reform Act 1988. We shall move an appropriate amendment to the Education Bill, now in another place.

This will preserve, during the interim, the duty on me and on the Secretary of State for Wales to consult about changes, but it will be designed to enable us to proceed to make those changes after a single stage of consultation in cases such as this in which the need for change has been widely recognised and the changes themselves are the product of extensive prior debate, such as that which has been going on in the country for a number of months.

I say two things in conclusion—[HON. MEMBERS: "I resign".] That is only to be expected from the Opposition, but I am anxious to complete my statement, Madam Speaker.

These decisions will significantly reduce the work load on teachers in 1994. It is in the interests of properly taught children, informed parents, employers and the nation that the testing arrangements which I have described today should go ahead without interruption. If they do not, we will have an education system without adequate rigour, and we shall have conceded a decade's advantage to our international competitors.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): Does the Secretary of State realise that his statement illustrates the utter confusion and chaos in Government circles on this year's tests? Only yesterday, the Secretary of State was saying that there would be no further statement. No. 10 said that there would be; then it said that there would not be—little knowing, apparently, that the Lord Privy Seal and the Prime Minister had decided that the crisis of confidence in the Secretary of State was so great that he would be forced to make this statement today. Clearly, however, the reason for the statement remains puzzling, as the Secretary of State has said that there are to be no changes in the testing arrangements for this year.

The Secretary of State's statement that the tests must go ahead this year proves that he has learnt nothing and that he is still not willing to listen. Does he realise that no previous holder of his office so clearly united the independent schools with the NUT, or the Professional Association of Teachers with the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers, all of which, with parents and governors of all political persuasions, are totally opposed to the Government's imposed tests?

Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that no one is opposed to the testing and assessment of children but that the tests that he wants to impose are high on administration and low on educational value, and that no one has confidence in them?

If so many changes are to be made next year and in subsequent years, why does the Secretary of State persist in trying to make guinea pigs of our children this year? The logic of his own position must be to withdraw the compulsion to have tests this year. Why cannot he make the tests voluntary? Does he consider himself to be tied by his own legislation?

With regard to testing arrangements for future years, does not the Secretary of State realise that he cannot get the arrangements right if he does not admit that he has been wrong so far and if he does not understand his own mistakes? Will he now admit that he has been wrong? Will he admit his mistakes and consult widely, and not in haste, about the arrangements for the future?

We welcome the 11 specific points on which the Secretary of State has climbed down in respect of testing arrangements for future years. Thus, it is all the more incredible that he is forcing tests on children this year.

Looking to the future, I urge the right hon. Gentleman to understand that appointments to and the terms of reference and time scale of the Schools Curriculum and Assessment Authority are critical, that the membership of SCAA must not be determined by the Secretary of State alone, that a majority of its members must be people responsible for educating children, and that the review must be genuinely independent of the Government.

To that end, will the Secretary of State agree that the Select Committee on Education should ratify membership of the review body? Will he acknowledge that the review must not be a hasty exercise? Will he accept that, unless parents, teachers and governors have full confidence in the independence and in the appropriateness of the timing of the review, we shall not be provided with a long-term solution to this problem?

The real issue is whether the Secretary of State has demonstrated a capacity to listen and to understand the problems that he has created. He still fails that test. His obstinate and arrogant refusal to change this year's tests is incredible. He does not enjoy the confidence of parents, teachers or governors—even of his own advisers. He should resign.

Mr. Patten: I am very confused by the hon. Lady's attitude and by that of her hon. Friends, such as the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), who is one of 100 lead signatories to early-day motion 1988, which says that there should be no national curriculum tests whatsoever for seven-year-olds. It is very difficult to understand the Labour party's attitude.

The reforms that have been introduced since 1988 have at each stage been modified in response to views from teachers and other professionals and educationists. That is exactly what happened with the 1991 tests for seven-year-olds. They were translated into new and improved tests for seven-year-olds for 1992. They are now being taken in many schools up and down the country, and I believe that they will show a critical improvement in standards.

Each reform should build on the preceding stage of the reform. It is critical that the tests should proceed this summer, in the interests of the children themselves. People in this country will be amazed when they see the published test questions and will wonder what on earth the fuss was about. Sir Ron Dearing, in response to my remit letter to him of several weeks ago, said—he repeated it yesterday—that he needed the evidence of this year's tests in order to inform his review.

Sometimes the Government are accused of not listening. I have been to a good number of schools up and down the land and I have talked to teachers in those schools and in my Department. They have stated their views about the national curriculum and assessment. I did listen; that is why, several weeks ago, I set up the review under Sir Ron Dearing. That was a classic case of responding, quite correctly, to professional concerns. But in the meantime, if the reforms are to succeed, they must proceed.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): I hope that my right hon. Friend will reject the ill-considered advice that he has just received from the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor). Does he accept that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members and certainly parents will widely welcome his statement, which clearly shows that he has listened to parents and teachers and has simplified the national curriculum and testing? I hope that my right hon. Friend's announcement will be matched by an equivalent one from the trade unions withdrawing the boycott.

Mr. Patten: I welcome what my hon. Friend has said. The response of professional teachers will be interesting. I hope that they will respond to my statement this afternoon. It will substantially reduce teachers' work load, about which they have complained, and possibly introduce external examiners for tests at 11 and 14. I hope that teachers will welcome the reforms. No teacher should ever think that the national curriculum or testing is wrong or will not produce results in the interests of our children.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Does the Secretary of State accept that at least two of the things that he has said today will be widely accepted in the House—first, his recognition that the current testing arrangements impose an excessive work load on teachers in our schools and, secondly, his clear admission that the current testing arrangements are wrong and desperately need to be changed?

Does he further accept that many parents, teachers and governors will be bitterly disappointed by his statement today because, although he is offering changes in the future, he offers no changes at the present time, so the problems in our schools will continue? There is no end to the strife in our schools—strife of the Government's making. Does the Secretary of State really believe that by offering jam tomorrow he can get himself out of a pickle today?

Mr. Patten: The tests taken by any child at any stage of his or her career, be it GCSE or A-level, will always be subject to lively debate. People will often say that this or that question was not put in the right way or was flawed. It is certainly not my belief that the tests for 14-year-olds this summer are fundamentally flawed. It is a matter of professional debate.

Some people think that there are problems. Others, including professional advisers, such as the noble Lord Griffiths, who was chairman of the School Examinations and Assessment Council, do not. Lord Griffiths wrote to my on 18 April delivering the tests and saying that it was the view of his council that the tests had been well prepared. After all, they had been piloted during the previous three years.

Why should the tests at 14 go ahead this summer? I shall tell the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) why. Children have been working for the tests for the past two to three years. Children have a right and an expectation that they will take the tests. The hon. Gentleman should listen to Sir Ron Dearing, the widely respected independent chairman of the review I have set up, who has asked that the tests should go ahead this summer.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I would be obliged if we could have brisk questions and brisk answers so that we can get through questions from a number of hon. Members.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend ask Sir Ron Dearing to ensure that arrangements are made whereby heads of department in schools, especially English and technology departments, can put their views directly to him so that, by 1994, we shall have a better system of testing in schools?

Mr. Patten: I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that that has already happened. Sir Ron Dearing is consulting not only head teachers in a series of regional meetings, but a range of heads of department in exactly the way that my hon. Friend wishes.

Mr. Bryan Davies (Oldham, Central and Royton): Will the Secretary of State accept that his retreat into flexibility for next year is fatally compromised by his determination to press ahead this year? Is it possible in a free society—a society that is different from that of Napoleonic France or, dare I say it, of Nazi Germany—for professional educators to be forced to do something to which they are opposed because of educational principle? Does the Secretary of State accept that he cannot get the reforms through for this year unless he is prepared to put General Patten's tanks on every playground in the country?

Mr. Patten: I believe that it would be so sad if there were a boycott this summer of, for example, the tests for seven-year-olds which have been largely completed. That is why I profoundly hope that the NUT ballot, of which we shall have the result on Thursday, is not in favour of the boycotting of all tests at seven, 11 and 14. That would be a tragedy for our children.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): Having met head teachers and heads of departments in my constituency, I know that they do not question at all the need to test. My right hon. Friend will be aware that it is the practical application that has gone wrong. If this were a business, the people charged with responsibility for the tests would have been sacked. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that point, because those people have presumably been drawing good salaries while putting the tests together.

Mr. Patten: I am Secretary of State for Education and I accept all responsibility for education in England. I know that my hon. Friend brought a deputation of heads to the Department to see my right hon. and noble Friend Baroness Blatch. I welcome the fact that they accept the principle of testing. I urge my hon. Friend to urge them to recognise that, if we stop the process of reform, if we stop the national curriculum being implemented, if we stop the testing regime, if we pull up the plant and examine it for two or three years, we shall set back the whole process for a decade.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Secretary of State aware that his fall from grace has been coming for a long time? Nobody has exuded more arrogance and contempt for his colleagues than he has. He has strutted round the Dispatch Box like a puffed-up peacock on heat. Today, he has come in like a bedraggled battery hen that has laid its last egg. His intellectual elitism has overwhelmed his common sense, and the people in the country know it.

Mr. Patten: That was not so much a question as a statement, from which, as the hon. Gentleman recognises, I readily dissent.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the target of the neanderthal trade unions that have orchestrated opposition to the tests is not the flaws in the tests, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) referred, but the national curriculum itself? Would not the biggest possible betrayal of our children be to allow those trade unions to feel that they were once more in charge of education? They would preside over a lowering of standards, from which the country suffered for so many decades.

Mr. Patten: I am not sure why the national curriculum and the question whether we should have one or not has suddenly been brought back as a matter for debate. It is critical that we—like the Germans, the Japanese and the French—have a well established national curriculum. We should have had one decades ago, and it is critical not to be driven off course now.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): May I remind the Secretary of State that we are talking about the future of our nation's young people, and inform him that, in a previous capacity, I was responsible for the formulation, standardisation and application of various forms of educational testing, both for attainment and of a diagnostic nature. One of the things that we learnt at the time was that the over-application of such tests devalued them—they interefered with the education programme and were counter-productive.

Just how many of the Secretary of State's advisers have that kind of experience and take into account that kind of result or lack of result? I simply want the Secretary of State to justify his position logically, rather than coming out with the party political rhetoric to which he seems so fond of resorting. Where is the rationale, the logic? As yet, it is not in evidence. Ask the profession—those who are responsible.

Mr. Patten: Given the chance, I will.

On both the National Curriculum Council, which is concerned with curricular activities, and the School Examinations and Assessment Council, which is concerned with examination and assessment, there are six lecturers and six teachers. Each of the subject groups that has helped to set up and design the tests for seven-year-olds and 14-year-olds has included a substantial number of teachers—I believe, an overwhelming majority of teachers. That is the straight answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

Sir Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): I can assure my right hon. Friend that the lively debate to which he referred will continue—certainly as regards this year's tests. He will know from the views that I have expressed of my disappointment on that score. I have listened carefully to his statement and would say firmly to him that the package of measures that has been announced goes a very substantial way towards meeting the criticisms that have legitimately been made in connection with the way in which the tests should be conducted in future and as regards the content of the national curriculum.

In those circumstances, does not my right hon. Friend agree that there can be no possible justification for any attempt to disrupt and boycott in our schools this year? Does he agree that such action will not only serve to damage the education of our children—which is the most important thing—but will cause the Ron Dearing review, upon which so much depends, to get off to such a bad start as to make Ron Dearing's task almost impossible?

Mr. Patten: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I warmly welcome what he has said. Like him, I believe that industrial action and boycotting have no place in the classroom. I appeal to teachers to listen to Sir Ron Dearing and to his request for their co-operation. That is something that the teaching world owes the chairman of the independent review.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Contrary to what the Chairman of the Select Committee on Education says, the Secretary of State has almost admitted—in the most amazing statement that I have ever heard—that the tests are flawed, because he has agreed that next year they will not take place. If the tests are to continue, the education of children in our schools will be affected. Bearing in mind the fact that the vast majority of teachers, regardless of their union, are opposed to the tests, why is the right hon. Gentleman forcing ahead with them now? And what will he do when teachers boycott the tests, as they will?

Mr. Patten: Each test each year is a preparation for a test the next year, as well as being a test in itself. There has been an occasion in the history of examinations—of A-levels and O-levels and now GCSEs—when each year did not involve preparation for the next. That is why it is critical for the tests to proceed, and that is why Sir Ron Dearing has asked for exactly that to happen.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that nothing is more damaging to children than vacillation and uncertainty in their education, as in all areas of their lives, and therfore it is important to be consistent? Will he further agree that equality of opportunity is absolutely fundamental to the Government's aims for all children in education and everywhere else in their lives?

Therefore, would it not be wrong for some children to have tests and others not to have tests by some form of boycott? Is my right hon. Friend considering compiling a list of volunteers who might assist in the testing process when teachers or others involved are prepared to operate a boycott in a ruthless manner?

Mr. Patten: The whole purpose of the national curriculum and the associated testing regime is to deliver a minimum entitlement of education to all our children wherever they are and from whatever background they come. That is why it is so wrong, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Sir M. Thornton) said, that there should be any boycotting in the summer. Of course, we know that the tests will proceed in a number of areas—for example, the tests will be taken in London boroughs such as Wandsworth. When the results are published and when people see what the test questions are like, they will wonder what the fuss was about in the first place.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Will the Secretary of State, as a member of a Government who know the cost of everything but the value of very little, now step back and do a simple cost-benefit analysis? It is clear to all that the testing programme is in such disarray that any diagnostic value that it might have had for Sir Ron Dearing will be absolutely worthless.

Having marshalled more opposition throughout the world of education than has ever been witnessed before, will the right hon. Gentleman consider whether there might be an enormous cost benefit to him in withdrawing his insistence on pressing ahead with the tests this year and winning back some of the good will and morale throughout the world of education without which anything that he wishes to deliver for the children of this country cannot be delivered at all?

Mr. Patten: I am sure that the 430,000 hard-working teachers in England for whom I am responsible—I am not responsible for Scotland—recognise that their efforts are warmly welcomed. Those teachers have already put in an enormous investment of time to prepare children for tests at seven and 14. It would be a tragedy if that investment were wasted.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): Did my right hon. Friend notice the opinion poll the other day that showed that four out of five parents want the tests to go ahead? Does he agree that that reflects the severe concern that children have been preparing for the tests for the past three years and the important point—which the Labour party has clearly missed—that the national curriculum can be improved only if the testing goes ahead? Teachers, as professionals, have a duty to ensure that they do the best they can with the tests, so that Sir Ron Dearing and others can ensure that the problems are rectified.

Mr. Patten: No one in England and Wales will ever know whether the national curriculum is working unless there is a testing regime and the results are published. That is the only way in which we will know whether education in this country is performing at the same level as that of our international competitors such as Germany and France.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): May I be helpful to the Secretary of State by saying that the Government got a bloody nose in Scotland a few years ago on the issue of testing not from teachers or teachers' unions but from parents? Four out of five parents kept their children away from tests.

That parental revolt made the Government see late in the day that the best way forward was to allow teacher discretion on testing in the classroom and provide a partnership among teachers, parents and education so that the education of young people could be fruitful and go forward. Will the Secretary of State learn that lesson which the Government learned so dearly at their expense in Scotland?

Mr. Patten: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the system in Scotland is different; there is no Education Reform Act, and no national curriculum is laid down by statute. The education north and south of the border is completely different.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): My right hon. Friend's restatement of the principle of testing and of curriculum form are welcome in the House and in the schools. Will my right hon. Friend confirm again that it is his longer-term intention to remove a great deal of the overweening bureaucracy that has crept into the tests and to concentrate on basics, which I welcome? If he can confirm that, his statement will be even more welcome in the House.

Mr. Patten: That is so. I am sure that that is what will come from the Dearing review. I know that my hon. Friend speaks with experience—if my memory serves me aright, 23 years as a classroom teacher—so I take his views very seriously.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Has the Secretary of State considered the cost of the astonishing proposal that the tests at 11 and 14 years of age should be externally marked? Does not that constitute an admission that for seven years we have been getting the marking of external examinations done for nothing by teachers on the cheap? Would it not be better to use that money to provide better resources in schools, particularly human resources, to enhance the quality of teaching, which is the only thing that produces better standards in education?

Mr. Patten: If the hon. Gentleman casts his mind back to a survey in England—not in Wales—in March 1992, we asked 93 education authorities whether they tested regularly up to the age of 11. Only 41 said that they did so. If teachers are saying that they have been testing all along, national testing is simply a substitute for the testing that should have been taking place throughout that time in primary and secondary schools.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend recall that I brought a delegation of head and assistant head teachers to his Department some months ago and they were delighted with the changes that our noble Friend Baroness Blatch had already introduced? I have been ringing around my constituency trying to find our how many teachers were carrying out the tests. The majority are doing so—apart from one highly politically motivated gentleman. Children in the majority of schools have taken the tests and they are being marked. Teachers said, however, that they would like the tests to be simplified next year. They will therefore be delighted with my right hon. Friend's statement.

Mr. Patten: I am grateful for that, and I am sure that in most primary schools the tests for seven-year-olds will be taken, in Lancaster as elsewhere.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The Secretary of State, in his statement and his information to hon. Members at Question Time, has shown that he has failed the listening test; secondly, that he has failed the speech test; and in his reference to the early-day motion which I tabled last night with 104 other people, he has failed the reading and understanding test. I did not say that the tests should be abandoned. That was the opinion of parents who were polled by The Independent and NOP. My demand was a rather modest one—for this year's tests to be made voluntary.

I cannot understand why the Secretary of State made a statement about next year, implying that this year's tests must be badly flawed and damaging for children and teachers, and yet was unable to make this year's tests voluntary. In the light of the arrangements that he is making for next year, which we admit show a considerable improvement in his attitude, does he intend not to bring any pressure on local education authorities, head teachers and governors in schools where teachers decide not to carry out the tests this year?

Mr. Patten: I have only two things to say to the hon. Gentleman. First, the Government have listened to the views of teachers and others, which is why, several weeks ago, I set up the Dearing review. Secondly, I have carefully considered early-day motion 1988 standing in the name of the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends:

"that children should be assessed but not given National Curriculum tests at seven".

That shows what the Labour party is concerned about.

Points of Order

4.10 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can it be in order for the Ministry of Defence to make a major procurement announcement by letter and press release without informing the House of Commons first? The Minister of State for Defence Procurement has announced his decision on the landing platform helicopter carrier. He has announced that the order has gone to Kvaerner and Barrow in Furness, which has condemned Swan Hunter on Tyneside to closure with the loss of some 6,000 jobs. That is of enormous importance to the people of Tyneside and, I respectfully put it to you, Madam Speaker, it should be raised on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Shipbuilding has been carried out on the Tyne for centuries, yet we have had an announcement this afternoon that could deny shipbuilding on Tyneside a future. Is it right that a statement of such overwhelming importance to my constituents and thousands of workers on Tyneside can be slipped out without the House having the opportunity to question the Minister responsible? Is that an appropriate way for the Government to conduct their business?

Madam Speaker: I understand that the text of an answer to a question on this issue is already available to hon. Members. However, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will wish to make a submission to me in the usual way in time for tomorrow.

Water (Domestic Disconnections)

4.11 pm

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Water Industry Act 1991 so as to remove the powers of water undertakers to disconnect residential premises in cases of non-payment of charges; to constrain the installation of pre-payment devices for the supply of water; and for connected purposes.

This is a simple Bill but one which affects the lives of every one of us. Human life on this planet is made possible by the abundance of oxygen in the air and water in the atmosphere. We share that water with all other plant and animal life. It is part of a natural cycle. From our first cup of tea in the morning it passes through us and washes over us out of the tap and down the plug hole. It rains on the fields and evaporates back into the atmosphere and the clouds.

All major legal systems of ancient and modern times have adopted the principle that there can be no ownership of running water; it has to be shared as a genuinely common asset. It therefore cannot be right that a water company, contracted only to clean and deliver this asset, can say, "This bit of water is ours. You have not paid for it, so we shall not let you have any."

Thankfully, in Britain many key services are still available to all, withdrawal of which is not used as a threat for non-payment. We do not say that people cannot call an ambulance or the police, send their children to school or even have their dustbins emptied if they are late paying their income tax or rates. Water should take its place alongside those core services, which are basic to our quality of life. This Bill does just that.

Action needs to be taken urgently, because the scale of water disconnections is startling. From a figure of 7,600 in 1990-91, it has leapt to 21,300 last year. Unexpectedly, Ofwat has chosen today to release this year's figures. They show a welcome reduction of 12 per cent., to 18,600. But that still means that, for every working day last year, 70 homes in this country were, in effect, rendered unfit for human habitation, according to the Housing Act 1985.

The Act is absolutely clear: section 604 says that a dwelling house is fit for habitation unless it fails to meet one or more requirements, one of which is that it has an adequate piped supply of wholesome water. Each disconnection leaves a premises unsafe as a place to work according to the Factories Act 1961 and the Offices, Shops and Railway Premises Act 1963. For 2·5 million people, however, their main place of paid work is the home, not to mention the millions more who toil away every day at the kitchen sink.

Every disconnection also renders a house an unfit place in which to care for children or for old people, according to the care regulations set out in the Children Act 1989 and the Registered Homes Act 1984. We should also remember that the most common location of accidents that require hospital treatment is the home.

I am not suggesting that the process of delivery of adequate supplies of clean, pure water should not be paid for. It should be regarded as a valuable resource to be carefully used.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) asked a question about disconnections on 8 March, and the Government made a distinction between "can't payers" and "won't payers". They said that they offer safeguards against disconnection for those who cannot pay, and presented the vision of victims of water disconnection being obstinate, middle-class citizens with a couple of cars in the drive and sprinklers on the lawn, who wilfully refused to pay the water companies their reasonable dues. It is not like that.

Evidence around the country reveals that the victims of disconnection are people with other debts as well, who are often on income support. Yes, they pay up when faced with the nightmare of being without water, but they do so simply by getting further into debt with someone else.

There is no evidence that the threat of disconnection is what persuades people to pay their water rates. The number of unpaid bills was lower when disconnection was not the practice and bills were paid, along with the rates, on a property value basis. In Scotland, where it is illegal to disconnect water supplies, the courts are used as the final solution. That system works well.

The Government, through the regulator Ofwat, should give fresh consideration to introducing a simplified charging system that makes use of council tax banding. They should work with the Benefits Agency and the local authorities to produce easier payment schemes. That would be a more effective means of reducing non-payment.

It is for that reason that the Bill has received widespread help and backing from national consumer associations, the citizens advice bureaux, local authorities, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, housing organisations including Shelter, the Institute of Housing, the House-Builders Federation and the National Federation of Housing Associations, architects, public health officers and the Institute of Environmental Health Officers.

Those health officers have offered their backing out of a real concern for public health. I welcome the fact that, today, the chief medical officer has recognised that concern and has set up a small working group to consider the potential problems that water disconnections might cause.

I should like to quote from the environmental health officer of Canterbury city council—it is not a Labour authority, but we did very well, thank you, in the county elections on Thursday—who has written a report recommending a statutory ban on the disconnection of domestic dwellings. He states:

"The public health movement began in the last century and its major thrust at that time was to control epidemics of infectious disease . . . Our homes are all designed to make hygiene a matter of normal routine; we all expect an inside WC, a bath, wash hand basin . . . As soon as the water supply is cut off, hygiene becomes virtually impossible and the resulting 'insanitary' conditions can easily and quickly facilitate the growth of bacteria which cause disease".

We cannot take our public health for granted. At a time when the increase in notifications of water-borne diseases, such as dysentery, is causing great concern, Parliament could do one small thing to help by approving the Bill.

It is part of the Government's role to set and oversee standards relating to the quality of our lives. They must take the responsibility, along with Ofwat, to act urgently to reduce the number of water disconnections to domestic dwellings. But I say that even one disconnection is one too many and cannot be condoned. The practice must cease altogether.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Helen Jackson, Mr. Richard Burden, Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock, Ms Jean Corston, Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. John McFall, Mrs. Anne Campbell, Mr. Paul Tyler, Mr. Bill Michie, Mr. Brian Wilson, Mr. Rhodri Morgan and Mr. Malcolm Chisholm.

Water (Domestic Disconnections)

Mrs. Helen Jackson accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Water Industry Act 1991 so as to remove the powers of water undertakers to disconnect residential premises in cases of non-payment of charges; to constrain the installation of pre-payment devices for the supply of water; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 May, and to be printed. [Bill 194.]

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 22 April]

[MR. GEOFFREY LOFTHOUSE in the Chair]

ABOLITION OF PRT FOR OIL FIELDS WITH DEVELOPMENT CONSENTS ON OR AFTER 16TH MARCH 1993

4.21 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I beg to move amendment No. 21, page 137, line 32, at end insert—

'(aa) for which notice has been served that this is a non taxable field under Schedule 1 to the Principal Act: and'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient also to discuss the following amendments:

No. 22, page 137, line 32, at end insert—

'(aaa) for which no determination under Schedule 1 to the Principal Act has been made either in whole or in part as a non taxable field and'.

No. 45, page 137, line 34, leave out '16th March 1993' and insert

'such day as the Secretary of State may appoint by order, which shall be made by Statutory Instrument and shall be laid before and approved by the House of Commons'.

No. 24, page 137, line 35, leave out subsection (b).

No. 40, page 137, line 36, at end insert

(c) one in which in whole or in part, a commitment to a programme of Exploration and Appraisal drilling was undertaken under the terms of a licence agreement and approved by the Secretary of State before that date, where the field participants elect to so classify the oil field and to accept a diminishing percentage of allowable expenditure on exploration and appraisal to be offset against PRT and a ceiling on the amount allowed for each company as allowable expenditure for PRT relief; the percentage, the timescale and the ceiling to be determined by the Secretary of State and approved by the affirmative resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

No. 25, page 137, line 39, leave out subsection (2).

No. 42, page 137, line 41, leave out '16th March 1993' and insert

'the day appointed by the Secretary of State in subsection (1)(a) above'.

No. 43, page 138, line 1, leave out '16th March 1993' and insert

'the day appointed by the Secretary of State in subsection (1)(a) above'.

No. 28, page 138, line 11, leave out subsection (b).

No. 35, line 138, line 29, leave out subsection (e).

No. 29, page 138, line 35, leave out subsection (6).

No. 44, page 138, line 36, leave out '16th March 1993' and insert

'the day appointed by the Secretary of State in subsection (1)(a) above'.

No. 31, page 138, line 42, leave out subsection (7).

No. 32, page 138, line 44, leave out 'permanent' and insert 'any'.

No. 33, page 139, line 1, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 34, page 139, leave out lines 3 to 5.

Mr. Darling: The amendments concern the Government's proposals for the taxation of North sea oil and gas. Our amendments are designed to delay, or to provide for phasing in, the Government's proposals. We oppose the principle of the proposals for reasons that I shall set out, but the amendments would allow the Government to delay and, therefore, provide some transitional protection if the fiscal regime were to change so that petroleum revenue tax, both the tax and its allowances, was abandoned. The remaining and consequential clauses in this part of the Bill also have far-reaching effects and we will return to them later in Committee.

However, the amendments are also designed to draw the Government on what exactly is their strategy for oil taxation and energy policy—if they have one—and what calculations were taken into account when the Chancellor made his proposals. It should be illuminating not only for the Committee and the industry but, I suspect, for the Department of Trade and Industry and the Scottish Office, as the Treasury proposals seem to have taken them completely by surprise.

We should remind ourselves of the importance of North sea oil to the country. Without it, the country would be bankrupt. So far, 11 billion barrels have been recovered, 7 million are under production or development and a further 7·5 million are in potential developments that are known about. It is also estimated that between 4 billion and 25 billion barrels of North sea oil and gas have yet to be discovered, some of it in very difficult conditions. It is further estimated that we have between 15 and 50 years of self-sufficiency, again an important matter, and the position with regard to gas is similar, with between 20 and 50 years of self-sufficiency.

These matters are crucial when assessing the role of taxation in our overall energy strategy so that we can maximise our exploitation of this natural resource, not least because of the United Kingdom's severe balance of payments problem. We should also remember that this issue is of national importance. United Kingdom continental shelf sales in 1992 amounted to £7·7 billion —in 1984 they had been £20 billion. In 1992, they contributed 1·2 per cent. of GNP and the annual investment of £5 billion to £6 billion represents 25 per cent. of manufacturing capacity—another formidable statistic.

It is estimated that the Government's proposals will mean that manufacturing investment in the North sea will fall between £1 billion and £2 billion and it is further estimated that there will be a loss of tax revenue of between £2 billion and £4 billion over the next five years and possibly £6 billion over a 10-year period. There is no doubt that there will be a reduction in activity in the North sea.

The Ernst and Young survey of the industry is illuminating. It found that all respondents expect the number of wells drilled in the United Kingdom sector to decrease. A clear majority of those surveyed said that the attractiveness of the United Kingdom for future investment had diminished, and exploration was expected to decrease as a result of the Budget. That is the majority of people involved in the North sea and other United Kingdom sectors. Virtually all respondents expected a decline in the number of personnel working in the United Kingdom offshore industry. That is something which no Government can afford to ignore, especially as we have just heard that if the Swan Hunter yard closes another 6,000 people will join the dole queue.

[Mr. Darling]

The Committee will know that there has been a mixed reaction to the Government's proposals. We oppose them for three reasons. First and most important, there is a substantial risk that companies will take their new-found profits and invest them abroad. There is no guarantee that the profits that the companies now have will be invested in the United Kingdom sector. Secondly, the traumatic disruption caused to the industry by the suddenness of the Chancellor's announcement will mean that between 10,000 and 30,000 jobs will go. Some of those jobs are of great technical and economic importance and many may be lost for ever. Thirdly, there is no evidence that the Government have any strategy for oil and gas, just as we know that they have none for the coal industry.

We should also bear in mind that much of the future development is likely to be high risk and high cost. Some of the oil finds yet to be explored lie to the west of the Shetlands, in difficult waters. Others are in the Rockall basin, and present formidable challenges in retrieval. Some will be small and will not pay PRT, but, taken together, they could be viable provided that we get the taxation framework right.

I want to look at the Government's position to assess their case for making the change. Their position is a simple and familiar one—the Chancellor was strapped for cash. He desperately needed every penny that he could get. The Chancellor's strategy is a short-term, some would say very short-term, one. Indeed, some unkind people say that the only Chancellorship that he will have in July is that of the Duchy of Lancaster, in charge of the citizens charter—the ultimate humiliation for any Cabinet member.

Even on a charitable view, the Chancellor's calculations appear to have spanned three or four years, rather than the three or four-Government period that is the normal time span for the industry. The Government looked at what has happened with PRT over the recent past and their attention was drawn, not unreasonably, to the fact that they have been repaying PRT over the past two or three years. Instead, they should have looked at what has happened over the past 10 years, because the picture is rather different.

PRT receipts peaked in 1984-85 at about £12 billion because of high production and high oil prices. However, in 1991-92, revenues plummeted to £1 billion, due to the amount of eligible cost being claimed, and a net £200 million of PRT was refunded. I understand that the Minister may be about to tell us that the figure has escalated to £900 million so as to make his proposals more acceptable. However, we know that £200 million was refunded, whereas, in that period, the Government received only £50 million in PRT receipts.

Why did that happen? The Government have conveniently ignored the fact that between 1988 and 1992 two significant events, which must be considered, occurred. First, the Government and the industry were anxious to stimulate production, incurring high exploration appraisal costs. According to the Government's Brown Book—the annual assessment of what is happening in the North sea—a record number of wells were drilled in 1991-92. It says:

"During 1992, a total of 131 exploration and appraisal wells were drilled. Although this was 55 fewer than in the previous year, it should be remembered that 1991 saw the third highest level of drilling activity since exploration began in 1964. Exploration success has increased to a rate of 25 per cent., with 20 significant offshore discoveries being announced during the year, 4 more than in 1991."

It is not surprising that the allowances claimable by the industry increased. Equally, it is not surprising that in the past two or three years the picture has not appeared as attractive as it did in the previous 10 years.

The second factor that we have to consider is that the industry is still reeling from the Piper Alpha disaster which had virtually stopped production. Since then, substantial claims have had to be made in order to implement the Cullen recommendations.

At a time when the PSBR is forecast to hit £50 billion, abolishing exploration and appraisal relief seems attractive at first sight. The Government's £700 million gain claimed by the Chancellor arises as a result not of increased tax revenues, but of allowances that will not be claimed. The gain is based on exploration and appraisal and that may never take place because of the Government's proposals.

The £700 million claimed by the Government, by which the Minister will set some store, is disputed by many in the industry and outside. Wood Mackenzie, which has a formidable reputation as a commentator on the industry, suggests that the total might be nearer £115 million. Whatever it is, and even if we split the difference between the Government and Wood Mackenzie, the gain to the Government has to be set off against the cost of losing jobs in the industry. If the total is anything like 20,000, the Government have a formidable loss, not just in tax revenues forgone—most of those working in the industry are well paid—but in the cost of maintaining them on the dole.

The Government ought to look at the PRT for the past 10 years. They must bear in mind that much of the future North sea investment will be in technically difficult areas. Production is set to rise in the middle of the decade, but many future discoveries will be in difficult areas.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the principal object of any tax is to raise revenue to pay for public services? What does he think the revenue would have been from the tax had the Government not proposed the changes that we are discussing this afternoon?

Mr. Darling: It is clearly difficult to predict the future rate of PRT because we do not know what will be discovered. Clearly, even with all the allowances, if oilfields do not pay PRT because it does not fall to be paid, it will be difficult to make projections of how much will be paid.

If the whole PRT regime is abandoned, first the scope for the Government levying a tax on large profits is gone, and, secondly, the allowances that are available under the PRT regime are no longer available which is a discouragement to companies to consider potentially large fields in difficult areas, as they will have to meet the entire cost of exploration and appraisal work, while at the moment they can claim substantial set-off.

The PRT regime provides the taxpayer with a potential gain, depending on what is found and a number of other factors, but it also provides a useful framework to ensure that development continues.

The hon. Gentleman raised a fundamental question which I shall address in a moment, but first I shall give way to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce).

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Is not the problem that the Government have removed their previous achievement of a stable regime in the North sea? The hon. Gentleman is making a reasonable point. Abolishing PRT removes the automatic regulator if the price goes up. No oil company in the world believes that the Government would not change the tax regime without consultation just as quickly and just as negatively as they have this time.

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman makes two important points. First, everyone to whom I have spoken in the oil industry, including those who have said publicly that they were in favour of the Government's proposals, freely admits that if the North sea sector started making large profits, in the middle of the decade for example, no Government of whatever colour would stand back and forgo the opportunity to raise money if the alternative was, for example, extending VAT to children's clothes or food or something else dear to the hearts of Conservative Members, such as raising income tax or taxation generally.

The hon. Gentleman's second point is equally important. The PRT regime was developed during the Conservative Government of 1970-74. It was implemented by the Labour Government in 1975 and it has been maintained, by and large, with cross-party support—although certainly with many adjustments—between then and the present time. It was then suddenly changed, without warning even to the Government's main energy Department, if one can call the Department of Trade and Industry such a thing—I am pleased to note that the Minister for Energy has at last turned up to listen to the debate—which is a major departure from normal practice.

I do not argue that the Government should consult every time they make tax changes—for obvious reasons—but when one considers the importance of the North sea and the United Kingdom continental shelf to the country's economy, it seems madness for the Government to embark on a course of action that could jeopardise the future of the North sea for this country.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) raised an important matter. There is a legitimate public debate about whether the public ought to subsidise, encourage or shield companies from the risk of exploration. It is a legitimate debate, but the Government have not yet joined it. There is an argument that companies should shoulder the whole risk themselves; equally, there is an argument that we should not throw away a tax regime that provides a subsidy—a shield, if you like—for the risks. It is important that the Government look after the United Kingdom's strategic interests in ensuring that we maximise the natural resource that we have in the United Kingdom continental shelf sector for as long as possible.

There is no point in denying that the changes will prolong the life of some existing fields. The Government have a point on that. There is equally no doubt that some incremental development around fields is becoming more attractive—there have been announcements in the past couple of days saying just that—but when one considers the effect of abolishing cross-field allowance and the change to the tariff receipt regime, it is by no means clear that incremental development will be as attractive.

In any event, in case the Minister is tempted to pray in aid the BP announcement yesterday and the Shell announcement about a month ago, I should mention that both developments were planned some time ago. Oil companies cannot announce major developments the day after the Chancellor has made an announcement.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that Dr. Gibson-Smith, the BP exploration chief executive, was telling an untruth when he said yesterday that the new BP developments were "made more likely as a consequence of the Budget changes to Petroleum Revenue tax"?

Those are not my words, but the words of the man in charge of exploration at BP.

Mr. Darling: Of course I am not suggesting that he is telling an untruth. What the gentleman said is that these developments became more likely. Is the Minister suggesting that in Shell people suddenly got up one morning and said, "Right, let's go ahead with this development"? They were considering it for some time and looked at all the sums. Then there was the fiscal change, and they said, "Yes, this is a great advantage." To say that had it not been for the Government changes nothing would have happened would be absolute nonsense. What the representatives of Shell were saying is entirely consistent.

Mr. Dorrell: I think the hon. Gentleman said that Shell was thinking about it before the Budget, that there were fiscal changes and that, following the fiscal changes, Shell decided to go ahead with it. Is that the hon. Gentleman's position?

Mr. Darling: It may surprise the hon. Gentleman to learn that, unlike some of his colleagues, I have no direct interests in the oil industry. I was not at the Shell board meeting when these matters were discussed, nor was I privy to its consideration; but it is entirely likely that Shell has been considering this matter for some time. These developments cannot be worked up from scratch. Of course changes are taken into account. I hope that the Minister will concede that other companies would have gone ahead with work that is now less attractive because of the petroleum revenue tax change, which will have a damaging effect.

I may be wrong, but I think that the Minister for Energy was nodding when I made my preliminary remark that these schemes were not just dreamt up after 16 March. I do not understand the point that the Minister is making. He seems to be making a great deal out of nothing in particular.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Human nature being what it is, would not it be reasonable to suppose that the companies that will gain large sums of money—we are talking about tens and, perhaps in some cases, hundreds of millions of pounds—from tax changes might believe that they are a good idea?

Mr. Darling: That is self-evident. I noticed a flurry of announcements yesterday. It is hardly surprising that BP, Shell and other companies are happy about the proposals. As I shall develop shortly, the changes mean that they have the money in their pockets and they will decide where to spend it; we might want to consider the implications of that.

Mr. Tim Smith: We should not object if they have the money in their pockets and decide where to spend it.

Mr. Darling: From a sedentary position, the hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. He claims that we should have no objection if companies have all this money in their pockets and decide where to spend it. He is right up to a point. From the point of view of the oil companies, that argument is overwhelming, but from the point of view of the United Kingdom, the Government and the people, surely we are entitled to ask ourselves whether we want a tax regime that runs a substantial risk of investment being exported to other parts of the world at the expense of a resource which we have in this country. Every Government, of whatever colour, have used the tax regime to maximise the resources available to them. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that that is wrong—possibly he still belongs to the rump of the Conservative party that believes in that system—that is fine, but it is not a view which we take.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who is muttering from a sedentary position, seems to forget that it was the Chancellor who said that the objective of the changes in the PRT was to raise revenue for the Government. It is the hon. Gentleman's Government who are attacking them.

Mr. Tim Smith: We do not want to tax people.

Mr. Hughes: He says that they do not want to tax people. The Government are caught on two hooks. On the one hand, they do not want to admit that they are applying the tax; on the other, they are trying to pretend that it is our fault that it is being done.

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield seemed to take the view that it is best to give as much money as possible to the companies, which will decide what to do with it. That is statable case, but there is an overarching, strategic view that the Government have to take on behalf of the people.

No doubt it would find favour in most parts of the Committee if I said that companies might be encouraged to search for large fields under the new system, whereas they might have been less enthusiastic under the old. Although they are no longer protected from exploration and appraisal costs, the risks might be high, but the gain would be immense. I dare say the Government will seek to argue that.

The only point that must be made is that when an oil company looks for oil, it does not know what it will find. In many cases, oil companies have gone into areas where they thought the field might be small and have discovered that it was much larger than expected. The argument is that they would not have gone looking in the small field if protection had not been afforded by the PRT regime.

In an excellent report on the impact of the changes on the Grampian economy published a few days ago, Professor Kemp of Aberdeen university said:

> "For new exploration and development activities the tax system facing investors is simply the corporation tax at 33 per cent. By world standards this is unique for a major petroleum producing province. Unfortunately there is no guarantee that this situation will be permanent and the political risk of further changes must be quite high."

The oil companies realise that, but it is interesting that Professor Kemp considers that the low tax barrier is unique. I suggest that the reason is that many countries take the view that there must be some fiscal incentive to go into difficult areas and, therefore, keep oil companies operating in a sector over which they have control, but if profits arise on a large scale, the taxpayer must be entitled to a fair share of them.

There is every prospect that some large oil companies will pocket their windfall gain and reinvest it elsewhere. We must bear in mind that we are in competition with many parts of the world. Substantial oil reserves are known to exist in the CIS, off south America and in the far east. Even in the United States, a high-cost country where profits are equally high, there are reserves as yet unrecovered.

Boardrooms are bound to take a broad view about where it is best to go. The North sea is a high-cost centre. If companies have the cash in hand, they will not have to invest it in the North sea; they can go elsewhere. Therefore, Britain will in effect be subsidising exploration in other parts of the world. To a large extent, the PRT system locked oil companies into the United Kingdom sector. Ultimately we will become an oil importer, but I see no reason to hasten that day.

The Government will also no doubt argue that oil companies were engaged in a spate of drilling where prospects were poor. However, given that the North sea is a mature field and that many new prospects are in difficult areas, that argument does not hold much strength. The other point that ought to be made is that in 1992 the success rate of drilling was 1:3·6, which is high for the industry.

I do not believe that the Government's case is proved. There is substantial doubt about the claims. I accept that over the last week, and particularly in the week following the Budget, good news was announced by companies that have prayed in aid the Government's changes, but, taken overall, there is a substantial risk that companies will be tempted to invest their profits in other parts of the world.

The position of the oil companies has to be covered. The position of the industry rather depends on whom one speaks to. Naturally, BP is laughing all the way to the bank, if not to other parts of the world. An examination of its most recent annual report is illuminating. When it deals with potential profit centres it says, among other things:

> "In the Azerbaijani sector of the Caspian sea we are part of a consortium which has a 20 per cent. interest in the Azeri field where about 1·8 billion barrels of recoverable oil are thought to exist."

Off Vietnam, it has started an extensive exploration drilling programme; in South Africa, it is investing in a refinery, and it is expanding in eastern Europe. There is nothing wrong with that.

It is good to see a British company doing all that and I would not want to discourage it, but hitherto there has been an incentive for many companies to stay in the North sea and to carry on drilling in sometimes difficult areas. If a company has the money in hand and has a choice between going to a high-risk, high-cost area or to an area where costs and risks are less, it might choose the cheaper option. I would not argue that one should seek to hold oil companies in an area that they would not want to be in. I do not think that anyone would argue that in regard to the North sea, but, again, I stress my doubt about our throwing away the incentive that we have.

It is not surprising that BP is pleased. Like the Government, it was strapped for cash last year and its tax bill has been cut by about £140 million. Nor is it surprising that it has been keen to encourage its colleagues in the oil industry not to complain, and to join the Government in praising the Chancellor's announcement. Shell has also joined forces with BP in announcing developments. Those developments were not planned recently.

While some companies say that new investment will be encouraged, others say privately that since 16 March two things have happened which we should consider. First, the fiscal and political stability which they have valued in the North sea regime—a point made by the hon. Member for Gordon—has gone. It was of great importance and should not have been lightly thrown away. Secondly, the traumatic shock caused by the Chancellor's announcement may make many people in boardrooms, often in the United States with no direct interest in this country, look long and hard at the future of the North sea and decide that future investment lies elsewhere. As I have said, we are in competition with other parts of the world and the Chancellor may have provided the jolt which will provoke some companies to go elsewhere. Equally, for some oil companies the Government's proposals are disastrous, depending on how they were placed.

What about the supply industry? Exploration and appraisal work will decrease. In some cases, exploration will cost about four times more than in the past. Every oil company has said that exploration work will reduce. Indeed, already supply companies in the north-east of Scotland and other parts of the United Kingdom have started to indicate to their work forces that they will be laid off. More than that, many companies entered into obligations with the Government based on an existing tax regime which has been changed.

I am glad that we have on the Treasury Bench both the Financial Secretary to the Treasury and the Minister for Energy. Perhaps they will share with us the difference of opinion that is apparent between the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry. Press reports suggest that the DTI regards some of the obligations that companies have entered into as being legally binding, while the Treasury does not. Which is correct? It is crucial for them to say which obligations they regard as legally binding. Oil companies may test the point, but it would be useful to know Government thinking on the subject.

It is also worth bearing in mind that there were changes not only to the petroleum revenue tax but to the cross-field allowance regime, which has made any incremental developments attractive to the tariff receipt allowance, which discouraged the profusion of pipes across the North sea and which, as a result of its obligation, may skew the market—for example, in respect of offshore loading—in a way that is not altogether desirable.

The position of the United Kingdom in terms of the taxpayer and the economy should be at the forefront of the Government's consideration. The Government are proposing to abandon what is essentially a profits tax. Moreover, as I have said, they are abandoning a mechanism for locking oil companies into the North sea sector, which is a high-risk and difficult area. Indeed, we may have provided an incentive for them to go elsewhere, so our fundamental concern must be about where the money will be spent.

Will the companies keep the new profits, invest them in the North sea or take them elsewhere? We are also giving up future tax revenues—some say, on a conservative estimate, of up to £6 billion over the next 10 years. The balance of payments—an issue of great concern, given the fact that it is in desperate straits at the height of a recession—will not be helped if we start importing oil or gas.

The effect on jobs must come into our consideration of the whole issue. The Government—it is not usual for them to concede that anything they do costs jobs—have on this occasion conceded that up to 10,000 jobs will go. In his study, Professor Kemp says that between 7,000 and 11,000 jobs may go in the United Kingdom. Others have put the estimate as high as 30,000.

Considering that it costs £9,000 to keep a person on the dole and that most of the people about whom we are speaking are well paid, the cost to the Exchequer of losing those jobs would, I believe, exceed the savings likely to occur as a result of scrapping the petroleum revenue tax regime.

It is nonsense for the Treasury to look at the issue from one aspect. It considers that it will save perhaps £700 million by scrapping PRT. On the other hand, the Department of Social Security will have to pick up the tab, and it is clear—north American experience, where a similar state of affairs existed a few years ago, bears this out—that once those people have been lost, their valuable skills will not easily be recovered.

We are speaking not simply of people working on North sea oil rigs. There is a great deal of onshore activity involving geologists, physicists and people in the support industries, all of whom are highly skilled and highly paid and who contribute substantially to the nation's economy. We run the risk of losing some of them from the industry, while others will go abroad and will be lost to the country for ever. There is the additional problem that some companies may be tempted not just to cut back on exploration appraisal but to cut down on safety.

Most people accept that at some point there must be a change in the taxation regime. The North sea oil sector is mature and it has been obvious that the PRT regime must be adjusted and perhaps one day brought to an end. But this is not the time to do that, for the reasons I have given. With oil prices expected to remain low for 10 years or so, there is a limit to how much can be taken from what is essentially a windfall profits tax.

The Government should bear five points in mind. First, the PRT system should not be scrapped now. There is scope for adjusting the rate of the tax and the rate of allowances that can be claimed. There is a case for capping the allowances. All such moves would be possible under our amendment, and we shall develop those themes when we debate later clauses. The amendment would allow the phasing in of transitional relief, and if the Government are not prepared to concede the principle, they should accept that transitional relief would be of great benefit to the industry, onshore and offshore.

Secondly, the Government might consider abolishing the royalties that still exist for pre-1983 fields. That might provide assistance. Thirdly, the issue of speculative drilling could be dealt with through the licensing regime because it is for the Government to decide where companies go, because they grant the licences.

Fourthly, the way in which exploration and appraisal allowances are granted could be adjusted. For example, allowances could be given on the basis of part now and part after five years or so. The Government could take all sorts of measures to make the allowances more attractive to companies, while balancing those measures with the legitimate interest of the Treasury in recovering funds.

Fifthly, we could examine the cross-field and tariff allowance scheme. Sixthly, as I said, if the Government are determined to abandon PRT at this stage—although they would be wrong to do so—they must look carefully at the question of transitional relief, and our amendment would provide for that.

There is no doubt that the Government announcement has caused a major dramatic disruption to North sea activity. Transitional relief is a subject to which we shall return when we debate later clauses, perhaps after the Government have had a chance to reflect on what has been said. The Chancellor's record of forecasting and making financial judgments is appalling. There is no evidence to suggest that his knowledge of geology is any better or that his knowledge of what is happening in the North sea can be relied on.

North sea oil and gas are among this country's few natural resources that remain to be exploited. We are in competition with the rest of the world. Other countries are desperate for industry and are willing to provide incentives to get oil companies to go there, especially for the economic gains that can accrue.

Hon. Members in all parts of the Committee, and the Government in particular, must reflect on those issues before throwing away a regime which, by all-party consent, has served the nation well. We have an opportunity tonight to ask the Government to take stock, to coin a phrase. It would be a tragedy if North sea oil were to become another casualty of the Chancellor's poor judgment.

Mr. Tim Smith: The changes proposed by the Government have my full support. That applies to their substance and timing. My hon. Friends should not be in the slightest surprised that Labour Members are attached to an 83 per cent. tax rate, since that was the top rate of income tax in 1979. They like high tax rates. They like taking money out of people's pockets and spending it on their behalf. That applies as much to oil companies as to individuals.

That was the basis of the case made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), who believes that the Government are in a better position than the oil companies to make investment decisions. I take the opposite view. I believe in low business taxes because with low taxes—the standard corporation tax rate has been reduced from 52 to 33 per cent. in the last 14 years—investment is attracted to the United Kingdom. Indeed, that is why there has been an increase in inward investment. That applies as much to North sea oil as to business generally. Low business taxes are good. Not surprisingly, Opposition Members such as the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) support high business taxes.

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I am curious about the hon. Gentleman's introductory remarks. He criticises Opposition Members for apparently wishing to raise taxes. Is he not aware that the measure that he is defending will have the effect of raising taxes?

Mr. Smith: I shall come to that. It will raise more tax, but the hon. Gentleman will be aware that when the Conservatives have reduced the rate of income tax, the yield has risen. We do not find that surprising because high taxes are a disincentive to people to produce more income. I shall establish during my remarks that, as a result of the changes that we propose, more income and more revenue will be generated.

I remind the Committee that we are discussing a revenue tax and not a profits tax, although the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central continually referred to the latter. More revenue will be generated from the North sea, with the result that the yield from petroleum revenue tax will rise. The large oil companies, which the hon. Gentleman went out of his way to attack, will invest more in existing fields.

Not surprisingly, the oil companies hold on their shelves a number of prospective development projects whose economic viability turns on the oil price at a particular time and on the fiscal regime at that time. We were told by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central that the oil price is not likely to rise over the next 10 years—it is nice to have his forecast. If that is correct, these projects would have continued not to be economically viable, but because of the Budget changes they will now be viable and the revenue from existing fields in which Shell, BP and Esso have already invested heavily will rise further—as will the revenue from PRT.

The hon. Gentleman says that the result of all this will be that the profits are invested abroad. I believe that much of the money will be invested in new production in existing fields where there is a great deal of marginal capacity yet to be exploited—rather more than there is in the prospective fields on the edge of the North sea, which are often in much deeper water and it would cost much more to extract the oil from them. I concede that they may hold reserves, but the cost of extracting those reserves would be much higher. It makes a great deal of sense, therefore, to go for the reserves in the existing fields, from which the oil can be extracted with relative ease.

We need the change of regime to respond to changes in the North sea. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central says that we have had a stable regime for many years. In the next breath he claims that the North sea is now mature and concedes that changes must be made. The only issue at stake is one of timing. I think that this is the right time while he does not.

Now is the right time, too, because there has been a large fall in the price of oil. Of course it was right, 10 years ago when the oil price was much higher in real terms, to have a high marginal rate of PRT, but times change. In respect both of the greatly reduced oil price and of what the hon. Gentleman describes as the maturity of the North sea, the change is timely——

Mr. Salmond: Let us imagine that the oil price does not go along with the forecast given by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and sharply increases in the near future. Does the hon. Gentleman think it likely that any Government, regardless of political colour, would leave in place only corporation tax, faced with large windfall profits to be made from the North sea? Does he think it likely that any Government, regardless of political colour, would leave in place only corporation tax, faced with large windfall profits to be made from the North sea? If he thinks it likely, he will find that few people in the industry will believe it—given the circumstances of the early 1980s, when a Government headed by Baroness Thatcher increased the taxation regime left them by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn).

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that all Governments claim to be putting in place stable tax regimes, but they all modify them according to changed circumstances, such as I am describing. The oil price has dropped, so it makes sense to change the regime in line with what the Treasury proposes.

Perhaps the best reason of all—I think that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central just about conceded it—is that we raise taxes to pay for public services, even though no one likes paying them. It is nonsensical to keep a tax that involves either no yield, as it did last year, or a repayment of tax to taxpayers, as it did the year before. It is not sensible to continue with such a regime for long and it must be right to change it so that the tax is abolished or at least yields some revenue for the Treasury.

Moreover, the higher the rate of tax and the higher the allowances, the more economic distortions result. It is good if we can bring tax rates down, because it is much better for industry and commerce generally if investment decisions are made on their merits—on the likely yield from the investment—and not purely for tax reasons. I fear that in the North sea recently exploration companies have been making investment decisions principally for tax reasons, and that cannot be right.

What we need and will now have is a broader tax base, with lower rates and lower allowances. The ultimate example of that is the abolition of the tax altogether, which is what will happen with the new fields.

Of course there will be a change in the balance in favour of production and against exploration, but that makes a great deal of sense in the circumstances.

I understand the anxieties about the transitional arrangement. Such arrangement are always of critical importance as we move from one tax regime to another. The difficulty with the proposals in this respect is that a considerable cost would be involved, and it could be dealt with, as I think the amendments recognise, only by increasing the PRT rate. If one believes that a tax change is right and will benefit the United Kingdom economy and the North sea oil sector, it must be right to make this tax change straight away, which is why I support both the substance and the timing of the changes.

Mr. Robert Hughes: The debates on this subject so far took place before the events of last Thursday—the Government débâcle in the county council elections in England and the disastrous result for the Tory candidate in Newbury. Since then, we understand that the order has gone out from No. 10 Downing street that Ministers should be more caring and more listening. We wait to see whether the message has got through to the Financial Secretary.

Since the Second Reading debate, the discussion has moved on and some inconsistencies in the Government's approach have appeared. Winding up on Second Reading, the Financial Secretary admitted that there had been no discussions with the oil industry. He defended that in the following terms:

"I will comment on the proposition that there should be consultation with the industry. It seems to be a rather odd proposition that, before a Government consider raising tax, they must engage in consultations to give notice of their intentions so that the industry can bring forward its activity to take advantage of the tax system that we are seeking to remove."—[Official Report, 26 April 1993; Vol. 223, c. 818.]

He still refused to say what discussions had taken place with the DTI or the Scottish Office, or what advice he had received.

On the face of it, that would seem a reasonable defence. However, the Minister took a different tack when giving an interview last week to Robin Chrystal for the Press and Journal (Aberdeen). If the article is incorrect, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will tell me so:

"In a bullish mood the Minister chided offshore companies which have complained about the change. 'They should have seen it coming,' he said."

Later, the Minister all but ruled out any change,

"as he revealed that civil servants had been working on reforming the PTR regime for the last three and a half years."

In my innocence, I believed what the Financial Secretary said in the earlier debate, thinking that he had got his proposals wrong because he had not had time to think them through or to work out their effects on sections of the industry. Now we are told that the changes have been worked on for three and a half years.

It certainly seems to be implied that the industry was party to the discussions. The Minister seems to be shaking his head, but if the industry was not party to the discussions, how could it have foreseen the changes?

Mr. Dorrell: My point was that this is a sophisticated industry which employs a large number of sophisticated tax advisers. One does not need to be a rocket scientist to work out that a tax system costing the Exchequer money is not one that will last for much longer.

Mr. Hughes: The Minister seems to be saying that the oil companies should have looked into their crystal ball and seen which way the wind was blowing and that it was all their fault that they were caught out, not the Government's.

The Minister's first proposition to the House was nearer the truth—that the possibility of the changes was kept from the industry to avoid its taking advantage of the information. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. Either he kept it quiet, or the industry had a good idea what was going on. According to the article, the industry knew all about this, so it was the industry's own fault. What he still has not told us is what discussions he had with the Department of Trade and Industry over the past three and a half years. He himself has indicated that these changes were under discussion. I am sorry that the Minister for Energy has left the Chamber, as his body language, if not his verbal language, might have given a clue as to what discussions had taken place and what advice had been given to the industry. In any event, the Minister cannot claim that he acted out of ignorance, as he certainly had ample opportunity to get things right.

All else having failed, the Financial Secretary's fall-back position is that there may be up to 10,000 job losses but that such an estimate is based on a wildly improbable scenario. Well, it is the Treasury's own scenario—and the Treasury is not given to putting forward such scenarios. I accept that we must all be careful about crying wolf. We are indebted to Grampian regional council for commissioning a study by Professor Kemp of Aberdeen university petroleum and economics consultancy. I appreciate that both Ministers took time out of a busy day to meet a deputation from the north-east of Scotland, including the convenor of Grampian regional council Dr. Middleton, the Lord Provost of the city of Aberdeen James Wyness, the chairman of Aberdeen chamber of commerce Robin Pollock, and representatives of all political parties.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Including the Tories.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, the Conservatives were certainly there.

In this regard, there appears to be near-unanimity in the north-east of Scotland—a very rare occurrence. I understand that the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) made a mysterious appearance at the meeting this morning. I do not know what he said, but perhaps at some stage he and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) will tell us not just what they think about the situation but also what they intend to do about it. If last night's voting is anything to go by, they will back the Government all the way.

The Financial Secretary has seen a copy of the report to which I have referred and will know that Professor Kemp and his unit are very well respected in the oil industry. These are not people who have suddenly come out of the woodwork; they have studied the industry for years, and their conclusions must be taken very seriously. I do not have the time this evening to go into the detail or the methodology of the report. I shall say simply that it is well reasoned, well argued and well researched. It deals with the effects on each sector of the industry and does not concern itself simply with the downside. The two conclusions are very sober and are certainly not exaggerated.

It is conceded that some parts of the industry will do well. Those with fields in production will have an incentive to prolong the active life of their reserves. Professor Kemp's guestimate—he admits that that is what it is—is that, as a result of the changes, about 1,000 jobs may be retained or created. Others in the industry argue that the incentive to prolong the life of the fields is there anyway. There is great financial advantage to be obtained from keeping the fields going. Sooner or later, when production is exhausted, the rehabilitation costs of removing structures and restoring sub-sea conditions will be massive. In any event, extraction policy will not be abandoned for the sake of minor tax changes; the real incentive is avoidance or deferral of rehabilitation costs.

Everyone accepts that there is a downside. I refer to the prospects for the exploration and appraisal of new fields.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is it true that Professor Kemp's analysis considers only prospects involving quantities under 50 million barrels?

Mr. Hughes: I do not think that that is the case. Professors Kemp's report presents a study of fields of that size and smaller fields. This is precisely the area in which the major damage will be done. If there were a sudden huge oil discovery—twice or three times the size of the biggest field, larger than Forties or any other—the tax changes would have no effect in this regard except that, as we know perfectly well, such a find would result in changes in tax policy.

5.15 pm

I do not know whether it is fashionable or allowable to quote Aneurin Bevan. He said, "Why look in the crystal ball when you can read the book?" Anyone who reads the book can see quite clearly that there has already been a downturn in exploration. Professor Kemp argues that that trend will be accelerated. Using the very modest multiplier of 1·25, a reduction of 33 in the number of wells drilled would result in 8,500 job losses—7,500, allowing for the 1,000 which might be saved—and a reduction of 50 in the number off wells drilled would result in 12,250 job losses or 11,250 net. Studies carried out by Aberdeen university over many years have shown that a multiplier as high as 1·78 could be used quite safely, without risk of exaggeration. That would result in the loss of 10,780 jobs or 9,780 net—or 17,020—16,020 net. At a conservative estimate, Grampian region would lose 4,000 to 6,000 jobs —a very serious situation on the basis of either forecast, and one that ought not to be discounted.

The message is quite clear: if the Government are not willing to change, we must at the very least have transitional relief, with capping, so that the smaller companies derive the greatest benefit and thus avoid the prospect mentioned by, among others, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith)—that there will be some sort of distortion of activity. The hon. Gentleman's approach to business is novel. The proposition that people go into the high-risk business of North Sea oil, which involves very large capital costs, on the basis that they will make money from tax relief is preposterous.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman has again mentioned the question of economic distortion. Did not Professor Kemp say that it is difficult to defend the fact that, under the present regime, post-tax returns exceed pre-tax returns? Did he not accept that the pre-Budget position was unsatisfactory and was in need of reform?

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman wishes me to go through every page of Professor Kemp's report and argue every detail, we shall be here until well after midnight. The hon. Gentleman is being very selective. I do not think that there is any difference between the parties in the Committee with regard to the fact that the Government faced a need to find money. That is the Government's basic objective—it has nothing to do with the unsatisfactory nature of the system. Having made their decision, the Government naturally looked around for suitable candidates for easy pickings. They took note of the oil industry's negative tax receipts, the pay-back, and ignored the fact that most of the costs that had to be paid back arose after the Piper Alpha incident. They did not work through the way in which smaller companies—the exploration companies in particular—would be hit.

It is not just Professor Kemp's report which presents these conclusions about the downside of the tax changes. The same message comes from many quarters, one of which is the Association of Service Sector Oil-Related Companies, which represents about 300 companies. Again, I could deal with that body's comments individually, but if I did so very few other hon. Members would be able to take part in the debate.

Wood Mackenzie—another company which has a great deal of experience in the industry and is very concerned about the changes—says in its report:

"If, as expected, the United Kingdom exploration and appraisal drilling levels fall sharply, the measures could be bad for the country in the long term, both in terms of balance of payments and the Government's revenue from the North sea."

That company has no political affiliation to the Labour party. I should not like to put a political label on Ian Wood.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Tory.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend is entitled to his view. I do not want to put anyone off Ian Wood's sagacious comments by saying that he is a Tory. They are good comments. These are serious dangers.

Professor Kemp points out that many companies may find it difficult to finance and develop export markets. As the downturn in the oil industry comes about—it is bound to come sooner or later—we in the north-east of Scotland do not want to be left with a ghost town. Aberdeen has benefited much from the North sea and so has Grampian, but we have not done so well in terms of cash from the Government to pay for the infrastructure. We do not want to be left with nothing once the industry has gone. We must build up indigenous companies which not only supply the North sea but are involved in the export market.

Confidence in the North sea is important. My goodness, the Government should know about confidence—they are for ever telling us about confidence, how important it is and how vital it is for the future of Britain that everyone should have confidence in the Government. The Government seem to think that they can destroy the confidence of companies in the North sea and that, when it suits them in two or three years' time, when perhaps they will change the regime again for their own purposes, the companies will simply come back again. The fact is that companies will not come back again once they have gone. They can go elsewhere to a less hostile physical environment and a more stable, congenial or amenable tax regime—and if they go, they will not come back. The Government simply cannot play ducks and drakes with the economy of north-east Scotland or the country at large.

The Financial Secretary and the Minister for Energy seem to have disappeared. I do not know whether they have rushed out to read the reports again and to consider whether to change their minds. I do not know whether the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has had reports of this morning's meetings, at which all said that they had a good hearing from the Financial Secretary and the Minister for Energy. Perhaps the Chief Secretary is frightened that they listened too well and has sent them packing so that he can take over the debate. We shall have to wait and see.

I hope that the Government will seriously listen to the representations from all parties, from many sections of the industry and from the whole of commerce. The chamber of commerce is certain that unless the Government are prepared to relent, unless they are prepared to have proper transitional relief, unless they are prepared to stop thinking only of the short term, great damage will be done to the North sea oil industry, to the economy of Grampian and to the country at large.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I am not concerned about the overall direction of the changes. If I had such doubts, I assure my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that his excellent speech on Second Reading would have brought them to an end. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend's commitment to a low tax, low allowances regime, which is much simpler to administer and operate, is a perfectly worthy policy which I am happy to support. Nor, despite comments from the Opposition Benches a few moments ago, do I doubt the need to raise extra money from time to time, the need for fiscal prudence and—I hope that this will be the reality—an extra £700 million from the oil industry.

However, a considerable number of oil companies and—of equal importance, particularly in my constituency—a considerable number of the companies which provide the back-up to exploration, development and production, are concerned about the way in which the changes are likely to be introduced. The proposals represent one of the most fundamental changes to the North sea fiscal regime since the beginning of activity on the continental shelf and certainly the most significant shift in policy for the past decade.

Therefore, I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that it is not unreasonable to provide some meaningful transitional arrangements, and that is the purpose of my few brief comments. Phasing in the changes would allow the United Kingdom supplies sector to adjust to the new circumstances and provide a more stable environment for the operating companies to fulfil the commitments made to the Government in good faith when licences were granted, particularly during the 11th and 12th rounds. I cannot believe that it is not possible to come up with a solution which provides a balanced phasing between the reduction in the rate of PRT and the removal of exploration and appraisal relief—this is the crux of the matter—on a fiscally neutral basis.

I was greatly reassured by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary on Second Reading. In summing up the debate he recognised the need to avoid unnecessary dislocation and assured the House that the Government would seek ways of doing just that. I think that my hon. Friend will agree that it is crucial that the service sector in particular is given the chance to adapt. An abrupt removal of the ability of companies to offset the cost of exploration and appraisal against profits generated on PRT-paying fields could lead to a reduction in exploration activities.

Much has also been said in the past few weeks about inefficient exploration by oil companies. Some people seem to believe that their attitude to drilling wells is based on a wing and a prayer, to which is added a huge cushion from the taxpayer. I do not believe that that is so. It is difficult to reconcile that with the comment of my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy that 1992 had the highest success rate ever for exploration drilling in the North sea.

For those reasons, I urge my hon. Friend to consider seriously the representations that he has received to provide some transitional relief. The precedent is there and it can be done on a fiscally neutral basis. When the changes to the rules governing corporation tax were introduced in 1984, a major element of the Government's package was a progressive phasing out of the allowances over a period of four years. There are many parallels between those 1984 proposals and the current proposals, not least the wish to widen the tax base and reduce the level of allowances. The major difference is the lack of any meaningful transition.

I hope that proper consideration will be given to allowing companies such as those in my constituency to take their business forward in an orderly and efficient manner, and time for them to adjust is the key. I urge my hon. Friend to propose a solution which prevents the dislocation to which he referred on Second Reading. Failing that, I hope that my hon. Friend is aware of the problems that I have sought to describe and that he will be able to address them at a later stage during the passage of the Bill.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: At the end of last year, as a member of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, I was heavily lobbied by oil and gas companies in the North sea who were concerned that drastic changes might be introduced to the contracts for providing gas for electricity generation. Within the Committee, I successfully resisted the idea that we should break up those contracts and so cause damage and loss of confidence within the industry.

At that time, interestingly enough, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) launched a high-profile campaign on the need to do that. Then, suddenly, the Budget introduced a potentially much more damaging measure, without any warning, consultation or opportunity for the industry to express a view.

During the past few weeks, the industry has been in a state of confusion and disarray as it has tried to analyse who will be the winners and the losers and the implications. It is the job of the House and the Committee to look not just at the industry but also at the national interest over time. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) referred to transitional arrangements for previous changes in the oil tax regime and to the reason why those arrangements were introduced.

5.30 pm

In 1986, when we suffered the effects of a sharp price downturn in the North sea, I was very active in trying to persuade the Government to introduce tax changes. It is worth reminding the Committee and the Chief Secretary, who showed no interest or attention at the time because it was not an area with which he had previously had contact, that the purpose of the changes was to try to ensure that there was a built-in incentive for companies to invest and to reinvest in the North sea so that there would be a kick-start to activity and to confidence. Those changes were successful. Activity has recovered, and there have been successes over the past couple of years in exploration activity.

Unfortunately, the Minister for Energy is not here; he has put in only a brief appearance. It is worth reminding the House what he said in the Brown Book this year:

"Activity offshore continued apace. Drilling activity fell slightly during 1992 but the success rate reached a new high with another 20 discoveries of oil and gas. For the 12th year running, the increase in known reserves has exceeded production. Not only has 1992 seen a further increase in the number of fields, but production too has been above 1991 levels. There has been a record level of investment."

How is that likely to continue given the proposed changes?

Exploration activity is at a level that is near the level reached before the downturn of 1986. Following the introduction of the tax measures in 1986, there was a peak of 152 exploration wells drilled in 1990. The figure dropped to 72 wells in 1992. In 1992, there were 41 appraisal wells compared with a low in 1986 of only 40. Development drilling was the one area in which activity was high; the figure was 140 compared with 85.

The implication of the figures is that the Government are running a real risk of introducing a depression in exploration and appraisal activity when the activity is already in a downturn. The consequences are not hard to see. I urge the Financial Secretary to take on board the point that no hon. Member—not even the Minister for Energy—disputes the one fundamental fact that the changes, if implemented, will lead to an immediate sharp downturn in the drilling industry and to a consequential loss of jobs. That is not a matter for debate; hon. Members on both sides accept that point. The Government must address the issue.

I have been interested by the contrasting speeches from Back-Bench Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said that he believed in tax-cutting measures, and that was why he welcomed the changes. The hon. Member for Stroud told us that he favoured the changes because they would raise revenue. The proposals cannot do both. Over the past few weeks, there has been confusion about whether the changes will yield a net increase in revenue.

As I said in an intervention in the speech by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), the Government have done themselves considerable damage in terms of the stability and predictability of the regime operating in the North sea. The Liberal Democrats have never argued against a continual adaptation of the tax regime to meet needs, but we believe that there should be fine tuning, that the regime should be predictable and that it should be introduced by consultation and negotiation. We believe that the implications of changes should be fully understood.

The Government have proudly boasted in past years that they have created just such a regime, but they have now torn up their credit without any real consideration of the long-term implications. That is why there is a definite case for transitional arrangements, and that is why I shall support amendment No. 21.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) has tabled a constructive amendment, No. 40, to which I have put my name. It allows some flexibility in the application of the transitional arrangements, which seems to make sense. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) will be a member of the Standing Committee on the Bill, and he will table amendments on our behalf. I hope that the Government will recognise that they are constructive and workable. They should be considered as a way in which to ensure that changes are introduced without a sudden and sharp downturn in activity.

According to the report produced by Professor Alex Kemp, there is likely to be a net loss of jobs of between 7,500 and 11,250. That is a relatively cautious estimate, which accords with the Treasury's estimates. In the north-east of Scotland, the estimate is for a loss of jobs of 4,000 to 6,000, which in a relatively small economy represents a significant downturn which will have consequences on the local economy.

I lived through the downturn of 1986, so I know that it was an experience that no one in the north-east wishes to repeat. Processions of people came to my constituency surgery who had not only lost their jobs but found that, because of the downturn in activity, the fall in price of their houses had dropped them into sharp negative equity. New houses were being sold by builders at a price lower than that for similar houses and lower than people's mortgages.

Some of those people are still having to pay off debts that they incurred then. Interestingly, no measures of assistance were forthcoming from the Government, and nothing was done to try to alleviate the hardship. We do not want to experience that again.

When I tried to enlist the then Prime Minister's support, her argument was that the North sea accounted for only 6 per cent. of gross national product and for only 0·5 per cent. of employment. That showed a cavalier and dismissive attitude. The Government's attitude towards the North sea has been that it is more a source of revenue than an industry that needs to be given stability and momentum.

The effects of uncertainty are far-reaching. I know of one company involved in the drilling supply sector in my constituency which was sufficiently concerned for no fewer than 350 of the employees to send a letter to me immediately after the Budget expressing their concern about the future of their jobs. Many other constituents have written to me expressing concern about the future.

The fabrication yards in the highlands are extremely short of orders. Highland Fabricators and McDermott's have also said that they find the uncertainty extremely worrying. The Government make great play of confidence. The sudden change in direction has damaged confidence in the industry when confidence has been somewhat fragile in recent months.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Has the hon. Gentleman received any letters from the several thousand employees of BP whose jobs, according to BP, have been made more secure by the petroleum revenue tax reforms?

Mr. Bruce: That is not necessarily true. The hon. Gentleman may know that BP has made many people redundant in the past year and has very much damaged its own internal relations by the way in which it has handled the redundancies. BP is the largest employer in my constituency, so I am very mindful of what BP has said. However, I have also gone on the record as saying that BP's financial difficulties are well known. It is not surprising, therefore, that BP is likely to welcome a windfall which will help its short-term return to profitability. The balance between the long term and the short term is part of the fundamental debate, as is the balance between individual companies and the national interest.

The regime will hit one sector very hard. It is extremely unfortunate because, in recent years, we have begun to build a British indigenous drilling and drilling supply industry. It will be seriously damaged, without justification and without warning. The Government should take that factor on board; I urge them to recognise that that is the strongest case for a transitional arrangement which will allow the industry to adjust.

The second point that must be taken on board concerns the success rate of exploration—precisely the matter to which the Minister for Energy referred. The danger now is that the Government are encouraging people to invest in the existing infrastructure at the expense of seeking new fields and new developments for the future. Exploration is, by definition, an uncertain business, and incentive to explore has been extremely productive in the national interest. There has been plenty of evidence of that, not least in either the fourth or fifth round in which blocks were auctioned, when Shell and Esso paid £21 million for the so-called golden block, on which they proceeded to drill three dry holes. The major discovery associated with that round was the Brent field, which is on one of the blocks that Shell and Esso were forced to take in association with the one that they wished to buy. Oil does not always come out of the ground exactly where one expects it to and exploration is a risky business.

I urge the Government to consider the point made by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central—that the Government are giving companies a return on their profits that they have no obligation whatever to reinvest in the United Kingdom sector of the North sea. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield said that he hoped and believed that companies would reinvest. But the existing regime ensures that they do—not by direction or force but by making it so financially attractive that, by definition, they will orient their future activity back to the United Kingdom.

There are many bids in other parts of the world to attract activity away. There is much talk about the opportunities in places such as Kazakhstan and Vietnam. We need to ensure that we have a regime that encourages continuing investment here and takes into account the national interest, which requires us to maintain continuity of employment and expertise as well as the ability of British-based companies to develop and enhance that expertise. We need a regime that is designed to ensure that we maximise exploration and the discovery of new reserves and that the industry has a long-term stable future.

I am not persuaded that the changes were introduced for the good of the industry. I think that they were introduced because the Government believed that they needed money and needed it fast. In introducing them, the Government have knocked the confidence of the industry. They have damaged the drilling industry and have threatened the livelihoods of thousands of people in the north-east of Scotland. I urge the Minister to take those points extremely seriously and to recognise that, at the very least, transitional arrangements should be introduced to minimise the impact of the changes.

I am not happy when Government Departments say that they have deliberately calculated that a tax regime will cost 10,000 jobs, and when they apparently regard that as acceptable. That is destructive, and unnecessarily so. It should be possible to devise a regime that will secure the industry, the jobs and the future. The proposals as they stand do not do that, and I urge the Government to make sure that, when they have finished with them, they do.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South): I do not intend to detain the Committee unduly but I feel that there are some points that need to be made.

Let me start by addressing the imbalanced view that the Committee must have of Professor Kemp's recent report. Professor Kemp has been widely but selectively quoted by Opposition Members, and it is only right that the Committee should see the other side of what Professor Kemp had to say. Given what has been said, the Committee will be surprised to learn that Professor Kemp actually accepts that the pre-Budget position was unsatisfactory and was in need of reform. He is quite clear about that. He also said that the new arrangements will substantially improve the profit margins on the larger existing fields which have until now been very low. Anyone who knows anything about the North sea will know that that is to be welcomed.

Professor Kemp also acknowledges that the changes will considerably improve the net present value return from incremental investment on mature fields. Given the circumstances pertaining in the North sea, that is vital. He further acknowledges that the changes will give significant cash flow benefits to larger new oil fields. As we have discovered in recent weeks and with recent announcements, the days of finding major strikes in the North sea are far from over.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) was quick to quote directly from Professor Kemp's report in what was probably one of the classic selective quotations of all time. What the hon. Gentleman did not do was to read out the next two sentences, which put a wholly different complexion on the matter. Let me read out the whole paragraph, which the hon. Gentleman refused to do. Professor Kemp said:

"The presence of only one simple fiscal instrument applied to new petroleum exploitation activities in the form of a corporate income tax at 33 per cent. is quite unique among major petroleum producing provinces. It must constitute a significant attraction."

That last was the sentence that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central refused to quote. Professor Kemp continued:

"The level of take is certainly low by international standards."

5.45 pm

I concede that Professor Kemp had some criticisms to make of the Government's arrangements but they must be seen in their proper context and must not be taken in isolation—which Opposition Members were keen to do. Professor Kemp is critical in his assessment of the impact on exploration but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, Professor Kemp's assessment only considers prospects up to 50 million barrels in size, in respect of which petroleum revenue tax is not paid anyway. He leaves out completely the benefit of the abolition of PRT for larger discoveries. That is a significant omission on his part.

The Opposition have been quick to go to all sorts of independent analysts to find quotations to back up their case. I, too, can do that. Norman Smith of Smith Rea Energy Associates has gone on record as saying:

"The Chancellor has provided the majors with more of the funds that they need to tackle the frontiers, while at the same time making re-investment in production in the United Kingdom more attractive relative to foreign areas."

It is no use bandying quotations about: we can each find one to prove whatever we want to prove.

Mr. Darling: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Robertson: No. I listened to the hon. Gentleman without interrupting; perhaps he will do me the same courtesy.

The changes should be supported. The increased cash flow that will come from them will assist funding of significant——

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West) On a point of order, Mr. Morris. Is it in order for an hon. Member to refer to and specifically quote another hon. Member and not give way when that second hon. Member seeks to intervene?

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): That is entirely a matter of judgment for the hon. Member in question.

Mr. Robertson: The changes should be supported because the increased cash flow that will come from them will assist funding of significant additional North sea activity, and that cannot be denied. The life of the existing fields will also be extended. More oil and gas will be recovered than would have been the case; that also cannot be denied. The changes will allow for new fields and discoveries to be developed far earlier and far more quickly than would previously have been possible. The industry has up to 80 fields waiting to be developed. When jobs are being considered, the jobs that will be created from the development of those fields must be taken into consideration as well.

It has been said that exploration will be affected. It will be affected but it will not be as adversely affected as claimed. The Budget changes leave untouched a signficant amount of exploration activity. Moreover, there is still relief for exploration wells drilled within 5 km of an existing PRT paying field, giving added incentive and added encouragement for greater exploitation of resources which we know are already there.

The proposals——

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman be quite specific and answer yes or no: is he saying that he believes that no change whatever is required in the Chancellor's changes and that he will support them irrespective of the job losses in his own constituency?

Mr. Robertson: As I have tried to point out, I think that the proposals are in the best long-term interests of the North sea. If the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) can wait until the end of my remarks, he will discover how I intend to vote this evening.

The proposals have had a bad press; there is no doubt about that. Despite what has been said here and elsewhere, I believe that they have stood up quite well to the intense scrutiny to which they have been subjected. Just as I could not support moves at the beginning of the year to encourage the Government to dig for uneconomic coal, I cannot now encourage them to help companies to drill for uneconomic oil. There is no sense in subsidising oil companies to drill merely for the sake of their own tax bill. With companies representing two thirds—66 per cent.—of past and future capital expenditure in the North sea firmly behind them, the proposals are obviously in the long-term interests of the North sea oil and gas industry. The changes move us from a low-risk, low-reward North sea to a high-risk, high-reward North sea and, in reply to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North, I have no hesitation whatever in recommending them to the House.

Mr. Hoon: Clause 183 would reduce petroleum revenue tax on the operation of existing oilfields and abolish it on new fields. Therefore, it would abolish the tax relief that was available for the cost of exploration and appraisal on those new fields with effect from 16 March 1993. What is the Government's intention? Clearly, they want to raise revenue to fill the gap in public sector finances. Sadly, that seems to be the only consideration that they have taken into account. Unfortunately, they seem to have ignored the wider effects of their decision. It is necessary to ask whether it makes sense to abandon what all hon. Members agree is a stable tax position—which was successful in attracting investment into the North sea in the late 1980s—at a time when the country's energy policy, so soon after the closure of so many collieries, is beset by uncertainty and instability. It is extremely difficult to see any signs of a longer-term energy strategy in the Government's proposal.

If it is necessary to spell out the importance of the North sea to Britain's economy for the benefit of Conservative Members, it might be worth mentioning a number of statistics. The North sea has contributed more than £115 billion in tax revenue. We have had about 11 billion barrels of oil, and a further 7 billion barrels of oil are available. It is not surprising that estimates as to how much is still to be discovered vary, but they range from 4 billion barrels to as much as 25 billion barrels. That is a significant amount of oil, the recovery of which will help to boost the country's economy. Instead of importing oil, Britain could expect to remain self-sufficient in oil well into the next century. Those discoveries have made, and should continue to make, a crucial contribution to our balance of payments, provided the Government remain prepared to leave in place the existing tax arrangements. Will the Government put at risk that benefit to the country's economy for the sake of a short-term addition to their shaky finances?

Comments have been made about the likely reaction of oil companies to the change in the tax position proposed by the Government. On any view, it will make oil companies reluctant to invest the substantial sums of money that are required to explore and develop new oilfields. That must be the case especially in the North sea. Reference has been made to the maturity of the North sea field. That means almost inevitably that new exploration is likely to be in the more difficult and marginal areas. Given a choice between investment decisions in more marginal North sea oilfields and investment in other parts of the world where other incentives may be available to companies, multinational oil companies, which have no loyalty to the United Kingdom, will be tempted to go elsewhere.

Reliable estimates suggest that exploration activity might be cut by as much as a half. After all, many areas of the world—a number have already been mentioned—are competing for new oil development. Obviously, those areas will benefit from the employment implications of the changes that the Government have apparently all too readily conceded will be the result of their proposals.

The Treasury has accepted that as many as 10,000 jobs may be lost. Perhaps not surprisingly, others have suggested that the number of job losses may be greater than 10,000. The majority of those jobs will be lost in Scotland, but many people who are employed directly and indirectly in the oil industry throughout the United Kingdom will be adversely affected. That is hardly sensible at a time when the country is suffering from the effects of high unemployment.

I shall quote from a document that I received this morning from the Association of Service Sector Oil-Related Companies, which puts the case graphically: "the existing proposals"— in the Budget—

"will act as a disincentive to continued North sea exploration and result in substantial job losses across the sector, weaken their ability to expand and grow into international markets, drain technological innovation from the United Kingdom, and increase smaller companies' vulnerability to hostile takeover bids. As a consequence"—

this is the conclusion—

"the United Kingdom economy as a whole will suffer."

That means that whatever oil is waiting to be discovered in the North sea will probably continue to wait until the opportunity is taken to develop new fields for the benefit of British consumers and, ultimately—this has been justified in terms of revenue raising—for the benefit of the British taxpayer.

The Chancellor and, indeed, the Financial Secretary have made much of justifying the change in the sense that the existing petroleum revenue tax system is costing the country money and subsidising exploration by oil companies. In one sense, that is true. We cannot argue against the figures that have been made available. However, the Chancellor and the Financial Secretary overlooked the fact that, in 1984-85, the United Kingdom raised about £12 billion in tax receipts from North sea oil. Tax receipts have obviously fallen because of lower levels of production as part of the recession and the fall in world oil prices.

By abandoning the present tax arrangements unilaterally in the way that the Government propose, they are abandoning the prospect of substantial tax relief in the future. They are effectively abandoning investment in the North sea in terms of gaining benefits today in extra tax revenue and forgoing the prospect of higher revenue later. By discouraging new investment, we will be dependent on the reduced levels of revenue that flow from fields already under development. We will be giving up for all time the revenue from new finds, which will not take place as a result of this change.

The Labour party believes that it is necessary to continue to support investment in the North sea and encourage exploration and development of new fields. In such circumstances, it cannot make sense to make a sudden arbitrary and short-term tax change. Even if the Government are determined to go ahead with the change in principle, surely it makes sense to consider our amendments which will allow transitional relief and the phasing-in of the proposals, otherwise we risk jeopardising Britain's employment prospects and the prospect of new exploration and development. As a result, we risk severely damaging our balance of payments position for the sake of a short-term contribution to the Government's finances. This is a panic measure introduced by a panic-stricken Government.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington): I shall not detain the Committee for long. There has been general concern about the change announced in the Budget and the Committee should discuss it in the serious way that it is and in a fairly objective way. Like some of my colleagues, I want some reassurances from my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary during the debate.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) understated the case in some respects. Perhaps it is the modern Labour way—having indulged in wild excess for many years, ultra-moderation is the way to get the message across. I welcome that as a general political principle, but on this occasion the hon. Gentleman underplayed his case. The fact is that Britain is a world leader in oil and gas exploration technology. The hon. Gentleman did not make much of that point. The United States and Britain are the two world leaders in oil and gas exploration technology.

There are few areas of British industry in which we have the depth and extensiveness of knowledge and experience that we have in the oil industry. When we look at our national advantages and our natural areas of competitiveness, we are spread rather thin—we are involved in many areas but not doing especially well in them. In the oil industry, we have an enormous depth of expertise and knowledge. We are using that expertise and knowledge not only to explore the North field but in other parts of the world—that point has already been made.

If we change the financial basis of our technological advantage, we must think carefully. It is a mistake to make dramatic changes of this sort. It is a mistake in principle to make dramatic taxation changes; I favour gradual changes in taxation in so far as they affect our industrial competitiveness. There is no doubt that the exploration effort in the North sea and elsewhere may well be affected by these changes, to Britain's disadvantage. There has been some dispute about that. Various figures have been bandied about the Chamber. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) and other hon. Members mentioned a figure of 50 per cent.—my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) disputed that.

What is my hon. Friend the Minister's estimate of the likely effects of the change in taxation? He may say that he cannot make a sensible estimate because he does not know exactly what the regime will be. However, I presume that the Treasury made an analysis before announcing the change. It must have made some assumptions about the likely effect on the industry of such a change, even before it had a chance to announce the change. What is my hon. Friend's feeling now about the likely effect on the exploration activity in the North sea as a result of the tax changes?

As others have said, the reason for the tax changes is that we must have general regard to the level of public expenditure and our problems with the deficit. We must consider increasing revenue. In the case of the oil industry, in the current financial year we shall make a gift to the industry of about £200 million, having taken a large amount over the years. As one of my hon. Friends said, the current position should not last long. None the less, we should not give a seismic shock to the industry to deal with a tax handback to one industry which may not be typical of what will happen every year. Is this an extraordinary year? Are the current circumstances unique? Will the £200 million handback increase every year or does it reflect the circumstances of the moment?

I am not sure that it is sensible to deal with what may be a relatively short-term position in the way that the Government propose. I am aware that discussions are taking place between the industry and the Treasury. I welcome those discussions. It is a pity that they have had to take place post-Budget. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central said that he accepted that Budget purdah had to operate and that it was inevitable that such measures were not properly discussed with the energy department of the Department of Trade and Industry before they were announced.

I would be rather more radical than the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central. It is proper in any sensible Government that there should be discussion with the relevant Department and especially the DTI about such changes in taxation. One of the faults of our Government has been that, as a result of the nature of government, they have not been able to arrange sensible, discrete discussions with the sponsoring Department before Budget changes of this character are made. That is a pity. I should like to see some changes made in that direction in future.

I do not go along with the argument that we should make such a change for short-term, tax-raising reasons. The oil industry is too important to subject it to such considerations. I want to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister that he has considered the position seriously, seen that there is a problem in the shape of the tax take from the industry, which has now become a tax give, and that he is prepared to re-examine the position. I want to hear that he has some objective and clear-cut ideas about the nature of the tax regime that he seeks to impose and that the change has been made, despite appearances to the contrary, for serious and objective reasons.

I want to hear from my hon. Friend the Minister that we can put in place a regime, the general character of which will last as long as the previous regime lasted. If we are dealing with a change that will help the industry and protect our acknowledged lead in the technology of oil and gas exploration, I shall support the Government because we shall be making the change for sensible tax-planning reasons. But I cannot support industrial competitiveness being damaged for short-term tax reasons.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Clause 183 abolishes petroleum revenue tax on oil and gas fields which are given development consent after 14 March this year. But it is just one element in a radically new tax regime for the North sea which has already been described by many experts and analysts as being designed mainly to put money into the coffers of the Treasury. At the same time, and as a direct result of the Government's short-term obsession with boosting the Treasury take, the new tax regime is likely to destroy future exploration programmes in the North sea.

The new tax regime will effectively shorten the economic life of the North sea. It will certainly cost thousands of exploration jobs in the North sea. It will seriously damage the oil service sector of the Scottish economy. In the long term, it is also likely to have serious implications for the new safety regime in the North sea which was introduced after the Piper Alpha tragedy some years ago.

Clause 183 is extremely important. The amendments which have been tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends are designed to put off the evil day when the new regime and the damaging consequences which will flow from it come to pass. The amendments will certainly be supported by Opposition Members, but they should also be supported by Conservative Members, in particular those who represent constituencies in Scotland, and especially the north-east of Scotland, as do the hon. Members for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) and for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch).

I am afraid that, tragically, we are likely to come up against the phenomenon that we witnessed last night in the debate on value added tax on domestic fuel and power. Conservative Members will be whipped through the Lobbies in support of proposals which are neither in their interests nor in the interests of their constituents. They will vote for the proposal to defend a discredited and bankrupt Government and, even more questionably, to defend their squalid little careers within that Government in the years ahead.

The Government will present what they are doing in a different light. They will package it in glowing phrases about sweeping away outdated, anachronistic and old-fashioned tax regimes which are no longer appropriate to the North sea. They will talk about introducing major reforms which will provide the industry with a stable framework for its future development. They will even trot out their supporters among the big oil companies to give some industry credibility to what they seek to do in the North sea. Such supporters include the chief executive of BP, Mr. David Simon, who has already welcomed the changes. He has forecast that investment in the North sea will be directly stimulated as a result of the changes; indeed, he has predicted even bigger profits for his company and other companies in the North sea.

I am sure that Mr. Simon is sincere in what he says about the changes. I can quote directly what he said in The Press and Journal immediately after the Budget proposals were announced. He said:

"I believe these reforms will encourage development of larger discoveries like west of Shetland, where a higher rate of return is needed to balance the increased risks and costs of operating in the more demanding deep-water environment."

That is all very fair, but Mr. Simon's company, BP, made the spectacular oil find in the west of Shetland last autumn and will develop that field. His company, BP, will pay the lower rate of petroleum revenue tax on oil produced from that field and, indeed, other fields. His company, BP, will now be able to make even greater profits than it has already made in the North sea this year.

I have here a quote from The Press and Journal of 7 May which announced a "BP profits gush". It said:

"BP stormed back into the black in the first quarter of the year . . . The oil giant saw net profits soar to £325 million compared with a loss in the corresponding period last year of £61 million."

So it is good times for BP and probably even better times ahead with the increased profits that it is likely to accrue from the changes in the North sea tax regime in relation to the discovery that it has made west of Shetland.

If the proposed new tax regime had been in place one or two years ago, before BP and Mr. Simon were given development consent west of Shetland, would they be so enthusiastic about it? If, before BP explored west of Shetland, it had faced the prospect of not being able to offset its exploration and appraisal costs against its existing liability for PRT, and seeing those costs quadruple at a stroke as a direct result, would it still have gone ahead with that exploration? I think that the answer is no. In fact, the full headline from The Press and Journal of 7 March reads:

"Cost cutting helps BP profits gush"

It is because of such cost cutting that BP has been able to get itself in the black. If it is faced with the prospect of exploration costs quadrupling overnight, the first thing it will cut will be exploration itself, because that prejudices its chances of making profits.

Under the new tax regime there will be winners and losers, but the Opposition fear that there will be far more losers than winners. Professor Alex Kemp of Aberdeen university, who has already been quoted several times today, says that he expects there to be a "host of losers" and "some winners"—he does not expect many. Those winners are likely to be the heavyweights, the major oil companies such as BP and Shell.

The losers will include the oil service companies, particularly those involved in drilling and exploration. They will include the smaller oil companies and the 14th oil and gas round that is about to be offered by the Department of Trade and Industry. They will include the thousands of workers who will lose their jobs and their families, who are dependent on their income. They will include the taxpayers, who will be expected to fork out up to £100 million in benefit to try to keep such workers out of proper employment. The losers will also include the Scottish-based service sector that supplies equipment for the North sea, such as mud pumps and drilling bits. Among those losers will be the many people who will remain working in the North sea for companies such as BP and other large companies.

It is important to remember how the new tax regime was established. The Chancellor was faced with a desperately bad public sector deficit and he cast about for the means either to cut Government expenditure or to boost Government revenue. At the same time, he also discovered that under the existing PRT regime, the cost to the Exchequer in 1991-92 was £200 million. The right hon. Gentleman was therefore determined to turn that situation around by scrapping all the allowances against PRT and thereby securing for the Exchequer, according to his estimation, £300 million in 1994-95 and £400 million in 1995-96. That turnaround is worth almost £1 billion. That is what the Chancellor expects to accrue from the changes. He tried to anticipate any backlash from the oil majors by buying them off with a reduction in their liabilities under PRT from 75 per cent. to 50 per cent. That must represent a saving of hundreds of millions of pounds for those companies.

In just two years, well in excess of £1 billion will be seized from the North sea oil economy by the Government and by the oil companies as a result of the PRT changes. That money must come from somewhere. It will be saved by companies undertaking less exploration and offering fewer jobs. Not only will that have damaging economic implications, but it will have serious implications for the North sea safety regime.

It is nearly five years since the Piper Alpha tragedy in the North sea in which 167 lives were lost. I have absolutely no doubt that the train of events that led directly to that tragedy began in 1986 with the then collapse in the oil price. That collapse cut the profits of oil companies and led directly to cuts in care and maintenance programmes and a decline in the priority that was accorded to safety. Here we are again, in 1993, discussing changes under which the Government and the big oil companies, working together, will take more than £1 billion out of the North sea economy. That may have serious, damaging implications for the current safety regime.

I know that the new safety case regime is in place following the Cullen inquiry. Reports and legislation are never sufficient to guarantee the highest safety standards in the North sea. To guarantee those standards, we must create the financial regime that is conducive to such standards. Because of the changes to PRT, however, profits will be squeezed because exploration costs will begin to rise. The contracts for drilling will become even more fiercely competitive than they are now and the temptation will inevitably be to make savings from wherever that is possible. I suspect that some companies will now try to get away with making savings on safety.

Blowout is the newspaper for offshore workers and the offshore industry liaison committee, the OILC. The June

[Mr. John McAllion]

1992 edition was published a month after the new safety regime was introduced and it provided information about one of the more recent tragedies in the North sea, the Cormorant Alpha helicopter tragedy, in which 11 men lost their lives. It provided proof that one of the victims had previously been disciplined

"for refusing to board a helicopter in circumstances similar to those on the night of March 14 when 11 men died."

It also noted:

"The pilot of the ill-fated Super Puma was not told of a serious weather hazard in the area."

6.15 pm

When Select Committees and inquiries, such as that headed by Cullen, take evidence on safety, the oil companies and their contractors never admit that that type of thing goes on. Similarly, they never admit that men who complain about lapses in the safety regime are victimised and blacklisted. That practice goes on to this very day in the North sea oil industry and hon. Members had better believe that. It goes on because of financial pressures, because companies are forced to cut costs again and again. The new tax regime is trying to make the same thing happen.

Someone must pay the price for all the money that will be taken from the North sea oil economy, and I suspect that it will be the workers, who will have to work in even worse, less safe conditions. That is the bottom line that we must take on board when we vote. That is why those Conservative Members who represent workers in the North sea must consider the safety of their constituents before they vote for a tax regime that will put those people's safety at even more risk in the years ahead.

I shall certainly check the voting list in Hansard tomorrow to see whether the hon. Members for Aberdeen, South and for Kincardine and Deeside and the other Scottish Tories voted for their constituents. They let the Scottish people down last night on VAT and they had better not let down the oil workers tonight.

Mr. George Kynoch (Kincardine and Deeside): As has already been said, I represent the employees and staff of many of the oil companies, be they large, medium-sized or small. I also represent those who work for indigenous industries that have, over the years, become oil-related service companies and those who work for drilling and supply companies.

After the Budget on 16 March, I obviously received many letters on the subject of the proposed changes to the PRT. The response was mixed. I spent the day after the Budget talking to representatives of a medium-sized oil company and debating with them why a move to a low-tax, low-allowance regime was infinitely superior to a high-tax, high-allowance regime. I suggested that those changes would bring those companies into line with the rest of British industry, because, by allowing them to keep more of the profits that they make from their production or finds, they can reinvest in their companies to produce further profit in the future.

After a period of deep reflection, many of the oil companies that had expressed initial concerns about the tax change, perhaps having latched on to the allowance side, then completed their highly complex calculations—whatever any hon. Member may say, the PRT is a highly complex tax—and revised their opinion. They accepted that, in the medium to long term, the tax changes were significantly beneficial to them, their employees, the United Kingdom and the North sea oil industry.

It is important to stress that those benefits will be apparent in the medium and long term, however, because my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is aware of my deep concern about the transition period. As the arrangements stand, many of the incentives that the tax changes offer, will not come through for 18 months or two years at the earliest. I quote from this morning's Aberdeen Press and Journal:

"BP £2 million booster is oil jobs bonanza."

It may well be as a result of these tax changes that that has been brought forward. It probably is. But I must emphasise that the work will not begin until early in 1995 and we are now in 1993. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has already said, on Second Reading, that he wishes to minimise any dislocation in the industry, and I know that he recognises that there may be dislocation. I know that the oil companies share his wish to see a fiscal situation that satisfies the Treasury and becomes tax raising rather than a tax cash curb. I am, therefore, exceedingly grateful to my hon. Friend for receiving the deputations that I have taken to him from the north-east of Scotland, representing more than 60,000 employees in the North sea, who accept the medium to long-term benefit of the change, but who see that there will be a significant dislocation to the industry in the immediate future.

I am equally well aware of the Financial Secretary's concern that by building a transition period without controls one runs the risk of overheating the drilling and exploration side and putting up drilling costs. It is a concern shared by the industry: it is in no one's interest for that to happen So I know that the industry is very keen to assist my hon. Friend's officials to work out a satisfactory capping proposal that will be fair to the Treasury, fair to industry and fair to the future of the North sea.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) that the Treasury should seriously consider this problem, but I must quote—again, I am afraid, selectively—from Professor Kemp. I will not go into the details of his acceptance of the inevitability of the tax changes and whether they affect small companies or large, but the one point that he clearly makes in his summary is this:

"The abruptness of the implementation of the budget proposals will create disruption in the exploration sector of the industry. It will also have an adverse effect on investor confidence in this sector. Exploration companies, particularly the small ones"— many of those are represented in my constituency—

"have based their E and A programmes on the basis of receiving full PRT relief for the expenditures. They can react in the short term only by sharply cutting their E and A activities. The result will be highly disruptive for the drilling contracting and supplies industry which are already suffering from trading difficulties. The medium term exploration effort of the smaller companies in the United Kingdom CS could also be put in jeopardy."

I know that that is only one opinion, and I know that British Petroleum and Shell have put an opposite opinion—they believe that there will be minimal dislocation and that the proposals should remain intact. Bearing in mind that I have in my constituency employees represented by BP and Shell, that puts me in a rather difficult position because they take the view that, in the short term as well as in the long, there will be no dislocation, but I believe that there will be a dislocation and that if my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary looks seriously at a fiscally neutral adjustment to the transitional arrangements, it may well smooth the transition to what I believe will, in the medium to long term, be a better tax regime for all concerned.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Gentleman has quoted, and indicated from his own discussions with the oil companies, various views. Is he in a position to inform the House what has happened since the Budget and what companies have done with regard to plans that they may already have had for exploration and appraisal?

Mr. Kynoch: As I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware, what has happened depends on which company one looks at. There has been a fairly mixed response. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and I attended a conference of oil companies at the weekend where we heard a very mixed response. Some contracts have been postponed, but other projects have been brought forward. The situation is not cut and dried. I believe, however, that many of the projects that have been conveniently announced at this time as being brought forward will not have their full effect on employment until 1995. There are small to medium-sized service companies in my constituency that will be put in jeopardy by the delay in the making of decisions and in the awarding of contracts. It gives me great concern.

However, the clause that we are discussing is not the one on which I have had representations for change. The Financial Secretary was good enough to hear the representations from my many constituents and has been good enough to allow his officials to continue discussions with representatives of the industry to try to determine whether the dislocation can be further minimised. I am sure that he knows that the appropriate clause—either clause 184 or clause 186—is most likely to be discussed in Committee upstairs.

I therefore conclude by urging my hon. Friend, while thanking him for having seen and considered these representations, to make sure that he understands the implications for my constituency, for the north-east of Scotland and for the United Kingdom Exchequer in the medium term.

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Kynoch: I hope very much that by the time the Bill is considered in Committee upstairs the negotiations and discussions that which have gone on——

Mr. Robert Hughes rose——

Mr. Kynoch: ——will have brought to fruition a satisfactory result for the north-east of Scotland.

Mr. Salmond: I could have told the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) that the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) would not give way because it might have punctured the alibi that he constructed for the latter part of his speech.

I would say to the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside that we are discussing the principle in clause 183. If the hon. Member really wants to see transitional relief, he need not go on pleading with his hon. Friend on the Front Bench; he just needs to join us in the Lobby to secure it.

There was an interesting contrast between the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside and his hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson). It is some sort of double act that we are seeing here, the nice copper and the nasty one. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South works them up and then the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside is meant to soothe them down. However, with their voting behaviour in the space of 24 hours, they are running a severe risk. Yesterday, they voted to put value added tax on fuel, voting against the wishes of about 99 per cent. of their constituents; tonight, it seems, they will vote to put thousands of their constituents out of work and, later this evening, if I read the signs aright, they will vote to decimate our fishing industry. That is a triple whammie delivered by these two hon. Gentlemen which people in the north-east of Scotland will find very hard to understand and will take a long time to forget.

We are debating clause 183 but also the principle of the tax shift, and I want to speak, in particular, about amendment No. 40 in the names of my hon. Friends and myself and supported by Liberal Democrat Members in which we are trying to make some positive suggestions as to how transitional relief may be effected. We do not want to do it by means of the fiscally neutral position that the Treasury has sought—that if one gives with one hand and takes away with the other, it will be satisfactory for the Treasury. One will never reach a consensus in the industry by selling some companies that they will lose prospective revenue in order to benefit others. That is not possible. In amendment No. 40 we propose that for a period a company should continue to be able to opt to receive exploration and appraisal relief, at a certain percentage and subject to a ceiling in the case of each individual company, to remove any possibility of an excess in the claim of any one company. I was pleased that we received from the Leader of the House last Thursday an undertaking that if any of this evening's amendments were carried he would see that the consequential amendments which might be necessary were brought forward in Committee upstairs. The hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside need have no fear about waiting for the Committee. All that he has to do is join us in the Division Lobby tonight.

There is a case for changing the tax regime in any oil province. The usual time to do it is when oil prices are riding high, and the industry is subject to overheating. Then, there can be a logical case for cooling down activity in the industry and at the same time getting more revenue for the Government. It is more questionable to do it when the industry, as at present, is already in a state of substantial over-capacity.

6.30 pm

There is a case for a low-taxation regime in the North sea. It is obvious that companies would like a reduction in their marginal rate of taxation. However, it is disingenuous for Ministers to quote major companies in the oil industry—Shell, BP and Mobil—all of which will benefit to the tune of many millions, perhaps even hundreds of millions, of pounds from the tax changes, as if that were some sort of independent assessment of the overall impact of the tax changes.

The story in the north-east of Scotland is that John Morgan of BP receives £10 million for every press conference that he gives. It is a sort of payment by results scheme. The more that BP praises the Government's taxation changes, the more that it realises how much it will benefit from them. I am not attacking senior executives in BP who say what a good thing it is that the tax change will bring the company lots of money. That is an understandable position for any company facing such a tax change. However, the Government have to understand that what is good for BP is not necessarily good for the whole of the oil industry. It is the Government's duty, sadly neglected, to take an overall view and see what overall balance of effects will result from their taxation changes.

If drilling costs in the North sea are quadrupled—that will be the effect of the tax changes—that will have a substantial impact on the drilling sector and will cost a substantial number of jobs. Furthermore, because of the suddenness of the change, it will cause substantial dislocation, because many companies will face sudden cancellations of contracts.

We have been talking in general terms and about big companies. I want to read briefly to the Committee a letter that I received from Steve Lee, the manager of the advanced technology centre of Core Laboratories in Aberdeen. It is a subsidiary of a major company, and it employs 100 people in Aberdeen. Mr. Lee wrote to me on 30 April saying:

"Since I last wrote, the confidence of the oil industry has continued to decrease, which has resulted in exploration/appraisal wells being deferred. The consequence of this to my company has been a substantial decrease/loss of orders. This in turn led to 16 members of Core Laboratories staff being made redundant on April 27th, 1993.

A reduction of 16 per cent. of the workforce is considerable. Unless and until there is a rethink on PRT there is every likelihood of further layoffs in the coming months. I suggest consultation with the WHOLE of the oil industry would be beneficial to both the Treasury and the oil operators."

Those are the effects on real companies and people in the north-east of Scotland.

We are debating the overall effect, the net effect, of the changes. Clearly, some companies will benefit and some will lose. However, as has been pointed in some of the correspondence in the newspapers, it is a fairly simple matter for an oil company to adjust its activities so as to become a major gainer from the tax changes. If one wants to be a winner, all that one has to do is up sticks and start exploring in other oil provinces elsewhere. Those who do not explore in the North sea will not be subject to the quadrupling of the price of exploration and appraisal.

We have heard from certain organisations, including Grampian region, the chamber of commerce and the offshore industry liaison committee. They represent local authorities, many of the employers in the region and many of the workers in the industry. None of the organisations has an axe to grind. All of them have workers working for winners and those working for losers. All of them have taken an overall view of what the net effect of the tax changes will be in their area and in the oil industry as a whole. All of them have come to the conclusion that the overall effect will be strongly negative and that thousands of jobs are at stake because of the tax changes that the Government are proposing.

As has been said a number of times, we are grateful for the fact that Grampian region commissioned a report from AUDEC Consultants and Professor Kemp's team at Aberdeen university. Conservative Members have claimed that Professor Kemp has been quoted selectively. They have said that Opposition Members are only quoting the adverse remarks in the report and forgetting to mention the positive things that Professor Kemp had to say about the oil tax changes.

It is obvious that an academic, and in particular an informed academic like Professor Kemp, when he is looking at an overall tax change that involves reductions in taxation in certain sectors in certain areas, will say positive things about the effect of the reductions. However, it is also true that the basis of the report was the desire to come to a conclusion about what the overall effect would be on jobs in the oil industry. There is no doubt about that. The report summary says:

"The Scottish level employment fall forecast ranges between 7,500 to 11,250. It should be appreciated that this does allow for the retention of some jobs as a result of incremental investment.

At Grampian Regional level, the jobs lost could be 4,000 to 6,000. Greater jobs losses are quite possible."

Throughout the report, Professor Kemp erred on the side of caution in every estimate. For example, those of us who have been involved in oil economics know that, for the oil industry, it is usual to use a high multiplier effect in estimating the overall consequences of job reductions. In the oil industry one usually takes a multiplier of 1·78. So as not to exaggerate the consequences of the tax changes, Professor Kemp chose the more conventional multiplier used for the rest of the industry, that of 1·25. If he and his team had wanted to exaggerate the effect of the tax changes, they could, quite defensibly, have increased the figures substantially. Wherever they had to make a choice, they erred on the side of caution.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House should accept that we are looking at a potential impact of around 10,000 job losses if the tax changes go through unaltered. I believe—I think that many hon. Members will also believe—that 10,000 jobs is too great a number to be so casually disregarded by the Government.

Did the Government know that that would be the impact before they made the proposal? We have to look at the now renowned quotation in The Press and Journal, appropriately enough from an article that appeared on April fool's day, immediately after the Budget, which used a briefing that was attributed to a Treasury official. The famous quotation "from a senior advisor" was:

"For 10,000 (job losses) we are securing £400-£500 million a year in taxation."

It seems that the Government and the Treasury engaged in a calculation and thought that they could secure hundreds and millions of pounds' worth of additional taxation and, if there was a cost of 10,000 jobs, primarily in the north-east of Scotland, that was just too bad and it was a "price well worth paying".

I see a puzzled look on the face of the Minister for Energy. That is not unknown. Over recent weeks he has often looked puzzled and confused. As he is here and giving us the benefit of his facial expressions, even if he is not giving us the benefit of a contribution to the debate, could he answer one of the questions of the debate? Were he and his Department consulted before the Treasury put forward the taxation changes? Did he give advice that was disregarded or was he disregarded in that his advice was not even asked for?

I am happy to allow the Minister to intervene to answer, as the oil industry would like to have that question answered. I see that he is shaking his head. Does that mean that the Department was not consulted or that he is frightened to intervene to confirm what many Opposition Members believe? We believe that the oil industry and the energy sector are so disregarded by the Government that the Minister with responsibility for them is not even consulted when serious tax changes are being considered with an impact on 10,000 or more jobs, primarily in the north-east of Scotland.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): The hon. Gentleman claims to be interested in these matters. May I refer him to the answer to a similar question that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade gave the Select Committee?

Mr. Salmond: We should like to know what it was. Was the Minister consulted or not? We can all consult the record afterwards, but I should like an answer during the debate as many Conservative Members are wondering how to vote this evening. Surely the Minister must want to tell the Committee whether he was consulted about the tax changes in the run up to the Budget proposals. I wonder whether the silence from the Treasury Bench tells us everything. I shall not even ask whether the Scottish Office was consulted as we can safely assume that no one would bother to do that. Scottish Office Ministers are not here this evening just in case they should be asked that question.

It is unfortunate that much of the debate outside the Chamber has been conducted in terms of the cash flow of individual oil companies—which companies would benefit and which would lose. It should not be a matter of the accounting position of individual oil companies but a flesh and blood issue affecting 10,000 or more families and the infrastructure of the oil industry in north-east Scotland.

I have heard the Treasury Minister, in many radio interviews, deriding those who question the wisdom of the oil changes by arguing that we want to give some advantage to the international oil industry. What greater advantage could be given to some of the largest companies in the international oil industry, at the expense of jobs and the industrial infrastructure of our oil industry, than that given under the Government's proposals?

I am concerned about the future after the taxation changes. One argument that the Government have put forward is that it will make the North sea a more attractive province, but that argument holds only if people believe that, if oil prices were to increase rapidly at some point in the future, there would be only a corporation tax regime in place.

No one in the oil industry to whom I have spoken, whether they are for or against the changes, believes that any Government of whatever political colour would leave a taxation regime in place which meant that only corporation tax would be charged on new discoveries if, once again, there were a major escalation in oil prices. The Government have introduced instability into a tax regime having previously claimed that, above all, the United Kingdom tax regime offered stability to the industry. They have undermined their strongest argument in favour of the United Kingdom tax regime.

It is obvious that the taxation changes will be bad for the industry. Clearly, any change that is anticipated to give substantial benefits to the Treasury in net financial terms will be detrimental for the industry.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) was right to say that at the end of the day someone will have to cough up for the additional revenue that the Treasury will expect from the changes. It will not be the international oil companies; some will lose and some will gain and the ones that lose will probably explore elsewhere. I suspect that there will be a cutback and a squeeze on the service companies and that many of the effects will be felt by the workers in the industry. One consequence of a financial squeeze, as we saw in the mid-1980s, is a reduction in maintenance and work force conditions.

The exploration sector will certainly have to become more competitive, but, once again, many workers in the North sea will face a hostile environment in terms of their conditions.

In conclusion, the changes in PRT are often described as resembling the Schleswig-Holstein question in European history in that only four people understand it: one is mad, and that certainly covers the Treasury Bench, one is dead, and in political terms that would cover the Chancellor, I have forgotten the third and the fourth is Professor Alex Kemp of Aberdeen university.

Professor Kemp was the adviser to the former Energy Select Committee. In his much-quoted report, he put forward the strongest possible argument for introducing some form of transitional relief to provide protection and attempt to save the jobs that are now at risk in north-east Scotland and elsewhere. Amendment No. 40 encapsulates Professor Kemp's recommendation and I certainly commend it to both sides of the Committee this evening.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Our debates last night and tonight have demonstrated to those who watch and listen to our proceedings, who read our debates and who are affected by the policies we are discussing the Government's ability to unite diverse groups across political and economic backgrounds.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) catches your eye, Mr. Morris, I am sure that he will remind you that it was not long ago that the Government attempted to make the same hash of the coal industry. They consulted no one, but simply produced proposals that they considered to be in the best interests of the Government and the Coal Board. They did not worry about Britain's long-term energy needs or the impact on workers in the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) reminded the Committee that, had there been an Energy Select Committee, it could have considered these matters. It is significant that the Government chose to introduce these changes in taxation in the knowledge that there was no Select Committee to monitor the month-by-month impact on north-east Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. The changes to the PRT will impact on employment, but not only in the north-east of Scotland. It is quite likely that some 3,000 jobs in the southern sector will be lost as a direct result of those changes.

It is also clear that those who will benefit most do not need the benefits as much as we need to continue to encourage exploration and appraisal in our oil industry. Companies such as BP and Shell do not need long-term encouragement that will accrue to them as much as the exploration and appraisal companies need it if we are to continue to benefit from the North sea.

What are the likely effects of the decision on the PRT? Certainly the cost of drilling a well will be increased four times as a result of the proposed changes, and that will affect the number of wells to be drilled during 1993-94. It will follow a reduction in drilling and exploration in 1991-92.

As hon. Members on both sides of the House have conceded, the number of jobs that will be lost is not quite clear. It ranges between 6,000 and, depending on whose estimates we take, 20,000 to 30,000. Even the Treasury estimates that about 10,000 jobs will be lost. It will not just be jobs that are lost but, as other hon. Members have said, the expertise and knowledge will also be lost, and once it is gone, as we discovered to our cost, particularly in the manufacturing sector, it is difficult to replace.

We have also heard the Government estimates that the net benefit to the Treasury will be about £700 million in a full year. Others have argued with that figure, and I should be interested to hear from the Financial Secretary exactly what he thinks about an estimate of £200 million or £300 million rather than the £700 million suggested by the Treasury.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The hon. Gentleman need not detain the Committee long on that issue, because the Treasury's estimate of the net effect of the changes to PRT is set out in the Red Book; he will find that the figures quoted there are £300 million in 1994-95 and £400 million in 1995-96.

Mr. Ross: The Financial Secretary must admit that other financial experts disagree with those figures. Only time will tell who is right. Given the Government's record on finance, I think people are more likely to believe estimates other than those given by the Financial Secretary.

The real impact will be felt by those directly affected. The cost to this country—if we accept the estimate of 10,000 unemployed—will be approximately £90 million to £100 million in lost revenue. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) asked the Financial Secretary how, why and where the discussions that led the Financial Secretary to recommend to the Cabinet that the Chancellor should proceed had taken place. The Financial Secretary helpfully said that there had been on-going discussions over three and a half years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North said, whoever the discussions took place with, they certainly never took place with the workers in the industry and the industry itself—the Financial Secretary said that he would have needed a crystal ball to decide or second guess the likely changes in the Chancellor's Budget.

As we now know, the Department of Energy was not involved in the discussions; I am not surprised at that. Neither was the Department of Employment, which will have to find jobs for the individuals who are liable to be made redundant as a result of the changes. The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), the Minister of State, Department of Employment, appeared before the Select Committee on 14 April, and I asked him whether his Department would be responsible for finding employment for those made redundant as a direct consequence of the changes in taxation and whether his Secretary of State had been involved in discussions with the Treasury. He said no, there had been no discussion whatsoever.

Although the Government will have to find some project or scheme which will provide training, re-education and jobs for those 10,000 people, the Treasury did not consult the Department of Employment, even though it will be given the responsibility. There was no prior discussion with the Department of Energy, with the industry, with the workers in the industry or with the Department of Employment. The Financial Secretary should tell us exactly who these discussions took place with.

My hon. Friends have rightly raised the spectre of the lost jobs in the north-east of Scotland, and those who will lose their jobs should be conscious that the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch) and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) are likely to support these measures. They should be aware that their unemployment, according to the hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside, will be a "positive response" to pressure from MPs for changes in the petroleum revenue tax which caused the unemployment. I hope it helps the unemployed, as they wend their way to the unemployment exchange, to know that a positive response made them unemployed. I am sure that there will be many people in those areas knocking on the doors of those two hon. Members, demanding that they find such people suitable alternative employment after the changes in petroleum revenue tax take effect.

My union, Manufacturing Science and Finance—which is the largest union in the oil industry—has other concerns. As hon. Members have suggested, when licences were awarded, the oil companies agreed to complete a given number of exploration wells. Those commitment wells are having to be drilled without the planned tax relief, so there will clearly be a loss to those companies. The DTI is insisting that those drilling commitments are met, and this will have a further impact on the ability of those companies to maintain employment.

It will certainly not be in the long-term interests of the country that we will have not a healthy industry, but an industry buffeted not only by economic recession—which, we are told, is not just here in this country but worldwide—but also by the impact of these changes in the exploration and appraisal tax proposals.

The White Paper on energy relied heavily on the expectation that the oil and gas sector would continue to prosper. This decision by the Treasury destroys any belief in a long-term plan for the industry. The international players in the oil business are looking for a stable fiscal background for investment. In one simple decision, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has destroyed Britain's reputation and, more importantly, shown that the Government do not understand the long-term nature of the oil industry.

The decision also sets a precedent for retrospective taxation. The commitment wells will be held to by the Department of Trade and Industry, and that will lead to further complications.

One point that has come out of this short debate is that, when such huge investments are involved, any change decided by the Government should be discussed in advance with those involved. The problems should be identified and the solutions sought before the change is gradually introduced.

I hope that other hon. Members will join the Opposition and vote for transitional arrangements which will at least offset the worst aspects of these changes.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): One of our main difficulties is the absence of an integrated energy policy. Obviously, we are a lucky nation in that we have indigenous oil, coal, gas and nuclear industries, but the taxation problem is causing unemployment.

This is a short-term affair; I can see it in no other way. Constituents write to me, asking in particular what is happening to the exploitation of exploration. An extractive industry will die if there is no investment in exploration. It is impossible to keep pumping oil up a single hole; the industry must be continually expanded. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) mentioned the threat that investors may go elsewhere: that threat is staring us in the face. Many nations have now lifted the barriers preventing multi-national companies from exploiting their resources. I am thinking especially of China. Many of the North sea companies' competitors are there already. One aspect of the industry is that those who are not there on the ground floor will lose out to a market that has potential for the future.

Another aspect of the current threat is the knock-on effect on technology. It will be our loss if we hesitate to exploit the deep parts of the North sea, the export potential for the next generation and all the facilities, know-how and equipment available because of a taxation problem. The export potential and know-how that we can give other countries is there, staring us in the face. If there is a run-down in the companies involved, or of the high-technology institutes with which such companies work, that alone could give cause for regret in the future.

I am adding my tuppence worth to the debate on the basis of what I consider to be common sense. Those who have written to me feel that, ultimately, they will pay the price for the Government's incompetence in organising an inquiry into the effects of their proposals; that cannot be tolerated. I know how I will vote tonight, and I appeal to other hon. Members to vote in the same Lobby to ensure that the Government reconsider their proposals.

My appeal is based on common sense. We want to exploit the whole of the North sea and its potential. It should not be thought for a moment that only Grampian and the north-east are affected: anyone who boards a London train to Aberdeen will see many former miners and shipyard workers from the north-east of England whose skills have been adapted for work in the North sea. Many technical people throughout the United Kingdom are affected by the cut in exploitation of resources. I hope that hon. Members will use their common sense and support the amendment.

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): I too will curtail my remarks.

I became interested in this subject because of two constituency considerations. First, I was getting many letters from men who worked in the North sea and were concerned that their jobs were at risk. Secondly, I was aware that a large factory in my constituency, United Wire at Granton, had quite a few employees making screening equipment for use in oil drilling. Even within a few weeks of the Budget, orders for that equipment had declined by 20 per cent.

The Government may be rejoicing that at last they have hit the bottom of the big hole that they dug for themselves, but the rest of us are still worried about unemployment. In Leith, we will not be dancing in the streets because 46 people came off the claimant count last month; we still have over 5,000 officially unemployed. My first concern is to make sure that no more people lose their jobs.

We have heard about other parts of Scotland being worse affected. My main question is to find out the Minister's estimate of the number of jobs likely to be lost because of the tax change. Is he sticking by the much-quoted press release of 1 April, which mentioned 10,000? Another way of putting the question is to ask him whether he agrees with Professor Kemp.

I accept that Professor Kemp says different things. There may be room for small changes in the tax regime, but the main thrust of Professor Kemp's report is that about 10,000 jobs will be lost. I intended to go into his report in more detail, but because of the shortage of time I will leave it.

Does the Minister go along with what small businesses are saying? The Government claim to support small businesses. Those businesses want to know what will happen to the licences they have. Will they have to proceed with them? Does the Minister realise that small businesses are saying that they will go to other parts of the world where the tax regime is favourable?

Why is it always BP which is quoted by Conservative Members? I think that BP is the only source which has been quoted more than Professor Kemp in the debate. BP, which stands to gain £150 million from the tax change, has been abandoning new exploration in the North sea for a long time. Of course a company can be a winner under the new regime if it does not want to explore. It was misleading for the Minister to quote the new BP development, because it has a contract for that, and it will still get tax relief on it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) asked, would the company have initiated the development under the tax regime?

Unemployment is our main concern, but many points about the proposal are reminiscent of problems which the Government have run into over the years. There is the short-term nature of the decision, as with so many other economic decisions. The Government seem to be saying, "Let us do something that will bring in money." It is connected with the problem of the public sector borrowing requirement. As with yesterday's debate, the tax proposal seems to be an easy way of solving the problem without regard to the long-term consequences.

Many of the mistakes which the Government have made in their economic policy are being repeated in this measure. One quarter of United Kingdom manufacturing investment is in the North sea. The low level of manufacturing investment has been a key problem under the Government, yet they are prepared to let that decline, with the result that overseas investment by companies will increase. Encouragement of overseas investment has been a feature of the Government for the last 14 years.

Even considering the matter in terms of revenue, if fewer new fields are developed, that will reduce revenue and exacerbate the fundamental balance of payments problem, to which the Government have not sought any solution. Many problems will be made worse by the measure. The main problem is that it will increase unemployment, which is still far too high in Scotland and throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I understand the pressure of time, but it is important to put on record that the changes will not just affect the east coast of Scotland, north-east and south-east, but will have a major impact on the west coast. The impact on the west coast may not be so great in terms of loss of income or the volume of jobs, but it may be disproportionately greater in relation to what those jobs mean for a fragile area such as the west coast.

There are direct and indirect implications. The direct implication involves people from the west coast who are employed offshore in the North sea and companies on the west coast that service part of the North sea sector. One of the most important, if not the most important, is in my constituency. The fabrication yard at Arnish, just outside Stornoway, opened in the mid-70s and closed in the late 80s when the company, Hereema, pulled out. Subsequently there was a management buyout. Under the local managers, and with the help, support and hard work of the work force, the yard has prospered, employing up to 200 people on average. That is a large number in view of the fragile economy of the Western Isles.

The quality of the jobs is as important as the number. In a rural economy dominated by agriculture and fishing, it is valuable to have highly skilled engineering jobs, filled 95 per cent. by local workers. Small yards such as that are likely to be the worst affected by the changes. Small yards will not pick up orders from companies like BP. They get orders from the smaller exploration companies which will be hardest hit by the changes.

As to the indirect effect, people from the west coast work in the North sea sector but they send their earnings home. That money plays a vital part in maintaining the economic health of the west coast.

One final factor is even more indirect—the potential impact on future exploration and development of oil and gas reserves off the west coast of Scotland, if they prove to be substantial. Some companies have expressed great interest in extending their activities to the west coast. Areas such as the Western Isles could gain greatly from that development. The companies providing services and supplies would probably not be as sophisticated as those that have sprung up on the east coast, but even if they were moderate sized they would have a beneficial effect on the fragile economy of the west coast.

It is deeply irresponsible of the Government to threaten the exploration and development potential of the west coast of Scotland. Did the Government take account of the longer-term effect? BP is showing great interest in the western continental shelf. It will turn out to be one of the winners from the changes. But I wonder whether BP will put its winnings into exploration and development off the west coast, given the effect of the changes. Did the Government even consult BP to find out exactly what the implications of the changes would be on the company's plans for developing off the west coast?

The jobs impact on the west coast of Scotland may seem relatively small in the context of 10,000 job losses overall, but it will have a huge and disproportionate impact on the west coast if exploration activity is seriously threatened by the changes. I join other hon. Members in asking the Government to reconsider the whole issue, especially the prospect of a transitional regime, and at least give a commitment that if things turn out badly for the industry as a result of the changes in the coming year or two, they will review the matter again.

Mr. Dorrell: It is common ground in the Committee that we are debating important changes with important implications for the structure of the oil industry in the medium and long term.

I begin by answering directly the hon. Members for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) and for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) and others. I can tell them clearly and in terms that the changes are the result of a substantial programme of work that involved consultation between the Treasury, the Inland Revenue, the Department of Trade and Industry and, before that, the Department of Energy.

The work was carefully prepared and the conclusions were reached by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the basis of that work. The common ground, shared in all parts of the Committee, is a desire to ensure that we have in the North sea a stable fiscal regime that is attractive to the operators in the North sea and the supply industry. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) about the importance of ensuring that we have in this country an environment that encourages the development of competition in the oil companies and the supply sectors.

No one can believe that the present system can properly be described as stable. The basic facts about the system are well known and on the record. In 1991-92, something that we call a tax cost the Exchequer £216 million. In 1992-93, it raised the princely sum of £54 million. So, in the last two years for which figures are available, the tax cost the Exchequer £162 million.

The reason for that in large measure can be attributed to development of the use of the exploration and appraisal relief well beyond anything that was envisaged when the relief was originally introduced. When it was introduced in 1983, the budget estimate was that it would have a revenue cost of £40 million. The cost in the most recent year was £700 million.

I stand absolutely by what I said in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North: any serious analysis of the present North sea fiscal regime must conclude that it is in need of change. That was obvious to me when I took over responsibility for the matter 12 months ago, and I think it was equally obvious to the oil companies and oil industry representatives who have been coming into my office in that 12-month period to talk about ideas for the evolution of the North sea fiscal regime.

I do not apologise for giving my view on Second Reading that I do not believe it is right for the Treasury to engage in direct formal dicussions about the future of tax rates and tax allowances in the system. That leads to serious distortions in economic behaviour, partly through companies responding to what they perceive to be a threat to the regime and partly through financial markets seeking to discount and second-guess what tax changes are likely.

I do not agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington that it is sensible for Ministers to engage in a discussion about the detail of rates and allowances. It is clear to me that any serious analysis of the North sea fiscal regime over the past two years must conclude that it is a system in need of reform.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister talked about a series of consultations, but I question whether many oil industry representatives were aware that they were taking part in consultations. He also talked of departmental consultations. He did not mention the Scottish Office. Was that a deliberate omission, or did he just forget it?

7.15 pm

Mr. Dorrell: The sponsoring Department for the oil industry was the Department of Energy, now the Department of Trade and Industry. The purpose of the interdepartmental discussions was to ensure that the decision—which rests properly with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—was made on the basis of proper knowledge. That knowledge was available to him and his decision was based on a proper appraisal of the alternatives.

Let us examine the substance and detail of the present position. We have a paper tax rate of 75 per cent. for the petroleum revenue tax. That is having the effect, in my view, of depressing development activity and potentially shortening field life, because it is uniquely the highest marginal rate of tax collected anywhere in our fiscal system now.

Mr. Darling: Will the Minister explain what will be the benefit of the changes? He talked about the savings, but one must take into account the PRT that will not be collected. What calculations has he made of the cost of 10,000 people losing their jobs? Can we be given an overall picture of what the position will be from the taxpayer's point of view?

Mr. Dorrell: I gave the figure in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee, West. I pointed out that the Red Book contained a projection for 1994-95 of £300 million and for 1995-96 of £400 million, being the net yield from the changes.

The 75 per cent. PRT rate is recycled into exploration and appraisal, so in many cases the taxpayer is meeting 83 per cent., if corporation tax is included—that is, 75 per cent. PRT plus 33 per cent. corporation tax—of the cost of exploration and appraisal in the North sea. But as most of the fields currently being found will not pay PRT—because of the effect of the allowances—the taxpayer's share of the return on those fields, if they are found and developed, amounts to 33 per cent. In other words, the Treasury is signing the taxpayer up to a deal under which the taxpayer contributes 83 per cent. of the equity in return for 33 per cent. of the return.

That fundamental distortion leads to the tax subsidies which my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) was right to deplore. I believe that if a project is uneconomic, it is no part of the job of the tax system to make that uneconomic activity appear economic. That is the result of the PRT system as it now exists.

Another principle of the reform which I hold to be important is that if the existing system will not raise any tax, we do well to admit it. It seems nonsensical to talk about PRT in the context of a range of fields when it is common ground on the part of all who have examined the issue that it is a PRT system that will not produce any yield from most of the fields currently being explored.

If there is to be no yield, it is better to admit it and abolish the tax. The only purpose of keeping the tax, if there is to be no yield, is to provide an excuse for paying tax allowances. It seems the ultimate absurdity, which is the position that the amendment would provide, to maintain a tax system not with the object of collecting tax but to pay out allowances.

If we want to pay a subsidy to a particular sector, by all means let us do so, but it should be properly justified, not brought in under the guise of a tax system.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Does the Minister accept that those of us who agree that there is a case for reform and are calling for transitional arrangements are worried that the long-term disincentive to exploration will mean that the Treasury and the economy will lose out because some oil fields may not be found? It is important to ensure a viable incentive to encourage oil companies to explore in the United Kingdom rather then elsewhere.

Mr. Dorrell: I am coming to the effect of the changes on exploration, which is an important point mentioned by several hon. Members. Before doing so, I want to draw the Committee's attention to something mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch), who does not uncritically support every aspect of the proposals. It was he who drew attention to the fact that there is striking unanimity in the industry on the point that the principles behind the long-term changes that we want to introduce are right.

I should like to quote not, as might be predicted, BP but a number of other companies. Mobil says:

"We believe that the changes proposed to the North Sea fiscal regime are well-founded and in the long-term interest of the industry and of the nation."

Amoco's view of the changes

"is one of welcome for their general thrust."

Marathon

"is supportive of the direction being taken. We believe that in the long term the development of UKCS oil and gas resources will benefit from these changes."

Shell UK believes

"that the thrust of the changes is correct."

The industry's association, the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association, says:

"There is agreement that the reduction of the PRT rate and the elimination of PRT for new fields is a welcome step which will be positive to enhancing productivity from existing large mature fields and to the development of new fields."

There is thus widespread recognition that the long-term effect of the changes will be to make the tax and fiscal regime in the North sea much more rational than the system that it replaces.

Several hon. Members have sought to concentrate on how we arrange the transition from the system as it is to the system that we want to create. I turn now to the transitional arrangements which the Government considered ahead of the Budget and for which we have provided in the Finance Bill. We must test proposals for transitional arrangements in two ways. First, as the new structure seems to be more rational and likely to lead to a better use of resources in the economy, it is important that the transitional regime delivers the change surely, so that there is no doubt that we will reach the end result reasonably quickly. Secondly, and equally important, we want the changes delivered with the minimum dislocation. I acknowledge that some dislocation from changes on this scale is inevitable, but we want a method of introducing them that minimises it.

Before we engage in a sensible discussion of the precise structure of transitional arrangements, I should add that I agree with the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington and by the hon. Member for Edinburgh,

[Mr. Dorrell]

Leith (Mr. Chisholm)—we must make an assessment of the effect of the proposed changes on employment and especially on exploration. That will tell us the size of the transitional problem with which we need to deal.

A number of factors are relevant in this context. First, four companies in the North sea together represent 40 per cent. of all exploration and appraisal activity there. They have publicly committed themselves to no reduction in E and A. The four are Shell, Esso, Mobil and BP. Secondly, 40 per cent. of current exploration and appraisal activity does not benefit at all from E and A relief from PRT. That being so, I am at a loss to understand how the withdrawal of the relief can lead to companies cutting short their E and A programmes. There is some overlap between the two categories, but as 40 per cent. of activity has been committed to being maintained and a different 40 per cent. is not benefiting from the relief that we are withdrawing, the worst case that we posited—a 50 per cent. reduction in exploration and appraisal—is, as I told an Aberdeen newspaper, improbably pessimistic.

I am reinforced in that belief by the evidence of what is going on in the present 14th licensing round. I understand that the Department of Trade and Industry told companies that had put in bids in the 14th round after the Budget that if, in the light of the Budget changes, they wanted to withdraw or change their bids, they were free to do so. Only a minimal number of companies have taken up that opportunity. So here we have a clear market test of the likely effect on exploration; it reinforces my view that it is profoundly unlikely to be anything like as serious as most of the worst case scenarios would suggest.

Mr. Salmond: The Minister is telling us that everything will be all right and we should not worry too much. Can he offer the Committee anything comparable to the thoroughness and academic rigour of Professor Kemp's study? If not, would we not be best advised to proceed on the conclusion of the professor's analysis?

Mr. Dorrell: I have given the Committee the basis on which I am working. Professor Kemp came to see me this morning and I asked him for the basis on which the reduction in wells had been posited in the most recent document. He said that that had to be a matter of judgment—his words, not mine. I have provided the Committee with the evidence on which we have reached our conclusion that a 50 per cent. reduction in the level of exploration is improbable, and it is not the only factor acting on employment and total levels of activity in the economy associated with the North sea.

I say that that is not the only factor, because it altogether omits the fact that the reduction in the PRT rate from 75 per cent. to 50 per cent. has the effect of doubling the post-tax return of all development activity and all current activity in producing fields. It was precisely that effect that led BP yesterday, in announcing its £1·5 billion development programme, to say, not that the programme was dreamt up after 16 March—of course it was not—but that, against the background of the Budget changes, its enhanced development programme was "made more likely" by those Budget changes.

If the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) prefers an alternative quotation, the company said that the programme was "given a significant impetus" by the Budget changes. I ask the Committee to recognise that, for oil companies considering development activity or the life of their existing producing fields, it is wildly improbable that the doubling of the post-tax rate of return will have no effect whatever on those two indicators of activity.

It was against that background that we carefully considered the transitional arrangements that should apply to get us from where we are to where we want to be. Three choices were suggested to us, and I will consider them briefly in turn. First, it was suggested from some quarters that we should protect obligation wells. That case was argued by very few companies—indeed, by almost none of the companies that have been to see me—and it is easy to see why. The bids that were put in during earlier licensing rounds, as in this one, were invited on the basis of a proper economic assessment, and the companies that submitted them overwhelmingly made their judgments on the basis of such assessments.

I was asked about obligations. Our position was made abundantly clear in a letter from my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy to UKOOA, dated 22 April, in which, speaking for the Government collectively, he said:

> "I regard the drilling obligations entered into as binding, and I expect these to be honoured . . .
> Of course, this does not exclude adjustments to particular wells in a drilling programme. We have always been prepared to consider, for example, the rephasing of individual wells on a case by case basis, having regard to technical or other specific arguments for change. But it was not our intention at the time of the Budget that there should be any general reinterpretation of the licensing obligations along the lines UKOOA appear to suggest."

That is clearly the position on obligation wells.

7.30 pm

The second suggestion is that we should phase changes in the tax rates and the allowances. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington saw some attraction in that approach. It seems to me that the problem is that, by delaying the PRT cut, we should be delaying precisely the incentive to which BP responded yesterday, while creating a powerful incentive for exploration companies to bring forward activity to benefit from the more generous allowances that would prevail—but prevail under notice. It would clearly be in the interests of the companies to act now rather than later, in order to benefit from a tax concession that we would have announced was being phased out.

Some hon. Members have said that that can be dealt with by capping. It seems to me that that illustrates the unattractiveness of that course. I am reminded of the common agricultural policy. It is acknowledged that a distortion is being introduced, but we are told not to worry as another distortion can be introduced to control the first one. That is not a very attractive way of designing a tax policy.

It is for those reasons that I prefer the third approach to transition. I refer to the Government's approach, as set out in the Finance Bill, which is based on existing contractual obligations. We have said that the changes will be phased, in the sense that, although E and A relief for new fields is being abolished from 16 March, the rate cut will take effect from 1 July. That has provided my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with up to £200 million gross for transitional relief, based on the existing contractual commitments of the supply companies operating in the North sea—precisely those most likely to be damaged by over-abrupt change in the tax system. That was the conclusion of our careful review, and it remains so.

I started by stressing the importance of stability in the fiscal regime. We carefully considered all the choices. We believe that this structure is robust for all likely scenarios regarding oil discoveries and oil prices. No doubt the detail of the proposal can be examined in Committee. We shall have plenty of opportunity for such examination. I believe that the structure of this proposal is the result of a serious programme of work. It is one in which the Committee and the industry can have confidence, and I recommend that the amendments be rejected.

Mr. Darling: The Committee can be in no doubt about the Government's position: there are to be no concessions on this measure. The Minister has not even disputed the fact that at least 10,000 jobs will be lost as a result of the Bill. I understand that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) is a former Tory party agent. Tonight, he must choose between the interests of the Conservative party and the interests of his constituents. Last night, he voted for an increase in the taxes of his constituents. If he votes with the Government tonight, he will be supporting a measure that will result in many of them losing their jobs. The hon. Gentleman's attitude stands in stark contrast to that of his hon. Friends the Members for Orpington (Mr. Horam) and Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Kynoch), who at least recognise that there will be transitional problems. But the Government have made it absolutely clear that they are not prepared to meet the legitimate demands of people involved in the industry and those living in communities affected by these proposals, who want some sort of relief.

The Government have not disputed the fact that exploration will be affected. It was astounding to hear the Minister pray in aid of this proposal Shell, Esso, Mobil and BP, which, he says, are committed to having no reduction. How can any Government rely on the best intentions of a company, stated just after the announcement of a Budget measure? It is the Government's duty to take into account the interests of the United Kingdom as a whole rather than the interests of a few oil companies. The measure will undoubtedly benefit some oil companies, as we have said during this debate. However, there is a substantial risk that exploration will be exported from the United Kingdom waters to other parts of the world, with the result that the natural resource we have in the North sea and in our Atlantic waters will be lost. There is no dispute about the fact that, because of the traumatic disruption caused by the Chancellor's announcement, jobs will go. The Government have made it absolutely clear that there is to be no transitional relief.

To those Conservative Members who have said in the Chamber today, as well as to their constituents by way of radio and television and the other media, that they are not happy with the Government's position I say that they now have a very clear choice. If they want to support the interests of the North sea oil industry and this country's long-term energy interests, they will have to vote for Labour's amendment. By voting with the Government they will shut the door on any hope for the industry. They have nowhere to hide, and I invite them to join us in the Lobby.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 48

Bad Debts

8 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 29, line 32, leave out 'six' and insert 'three'.

The purpose of the amendment is to allow businesses to recover more quickly the output VAT that they accounted for when making supply to a customer where the debt proves to be bad. It provides the opportunity for us to discuss more generally the extent of bad debt and its serious consequences for small businesses in particular, which make the measure all the more necessary.

Let me make it clear at the outset that we welcome the fact that the clause proposes to reduce the waiting period from one year to six months, which will be of benefit to businesses large and small. As firms that are not in the cash accounting scheme for VAT—I shall return to that scheme in due course—become liable for VAT when they send out invoices, but only get the money back when their customers pay them, which in some cases is never, the provisions have serious consequences for business cash flows.

We believe that, given the comment before the Budget —for example, in the Financial Times of 8 March speculating on the benefit of immediate relief on bad debt, given that the CBI was calling for relief on bad debt to be immediately available when provision is made in the traders' account—we feel that the Government may be being unnecessarily cautious in moving only to six months and we should like to press the case for three months instead. That would give a cash flow benefit to small businesses in addition to that estimated by the Chancellor in the Budget.

Such a measure is especially important at a time when bankruptcies are running at such a high level. Dun and Bradstreet reports that in the first quarter of this year there were no fewer than 15,443 businesses collapsing—a 3·8 per cent. increase on the same period last year. In those circumstances, bad debts themselves become a principal cause of business failure. There is a vicious circle. Firms that do not receive payment find it increasingly difficult to meet their own debts. That compounds the problem and if such firms are not themselves pitched into bankruptcy or liquidation—as, sadly, many are—they are at the very least more likely to join the legions of late payers, stoking up the overall burden of corporate debt overhang, itself aggravated by high real interest rates, which make forced inter-company credit the borrowing of first resort. That exerts financial stress throughout the business network to the point where those unlucky or adventurous enough to be the weakest links in the chain then break, with knock-on consequences all round.

I think that it is now generally acknowledged that that is an extremely serious problem, not only in the United Kingdom but, as Michael Cassell reported in the Financial Times of 23 February, throughout the European Community, where the problem has become steadily worse as the recession has deepened. Michael Cassel reported the Association of British Factors and Discounters estimate of the time taken for European companies to pay as having increased by on average no less than one third in 1992. That is borne out by a disturbing report in today's Financial Times. Apparently, a survey by NCM Credit Insurance shows that

"One in five UK companies lost money as a result of non-payment by an EC customer in the year ended March 1993, compared with one in eight in the year to March 1989."

Clearly, that augurs badly for British companies looking to the EC for business which Britain so desperately needs given the yawning balance of payments deficit.

All of that places a very real premium on the help that the Government can give as regards domestic late payments and VAT on bad debts. After all, in both cases, firms are merely trying to get back more quickly the money that is due to them.

We welcome the CBI prompt payers' code and hope that the CBI is successful in getting a much larger proportion of its membership to sign up to it. We believe, too, that the Government should be setting an example both in public sector payments and through their readiness to legislate where that would be of benefit.

It is an absolute disgrace that the Property Services Agency, being fattened up for privatisation, was revealed by the Public Accounts Committee to be making contractors wait months for payment because of delays by the Ministry of Defence in paying it. The Guardian obtained an internal PSA newsletter called "Paid when Paid", which revealed that the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, no less, was expecting companies to wait 44 days for payment in connection with defence, prison, courts and royal palace contracts, in contravention of the 30-day maximum target that the Chancellor of the Exchequer set in his Budget last year.

It is not enough for the Government simply to require Departments to publish details of their payments performance in their departmental reports. Although that is all well and good in itself, it does not give any immediate incentive to recalcitrant Departments, nor does it offer redress to contractors waiting for bills to be paid by those Departments. As the Government operate a system of penalties for businesses that are late in paying their VAT, why not apply a system of penalties—perhaps precisely the same penalties—to Government Departments that are late in paying their bills to businesses?

If that were brought in as an automatic supplement to which the trader would have a legal right, it would not only be seen to be fair but would offer some automatic compensation to the trader, would set a good example and would concentrate minds wonderfully in the Department concerned. It would show that the Government were prepared to match their words, which are cheap, with actions which might not be so cheap. I am sure that it would be welcomed by the business community.

The other important question to which the debate gives rise is why more small businesses do not take advantage of the cash accounting scheme which enables smaller businesses to account for VAT on the basis of payments received and made rather than the usual liability on the basis of invoices issued and received.

The Customs and Excise press notice issued on 16 March estimated that only about 40 per cent. of those traders who could benefit from the scheme were doing so. So although the announcement in the Budget that the threshold for eligibility for the scheme is to be raised from £300,000 to £350,000 and entry is to be made easier is to be welcomed, if small businesses are to derive the full benefit of the scheme and thereby escape the perils of late payment, we need to be assured that early action is in prospect on the outcome of the consultation exercise that is under way. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell us how soon the Government expect to be able to implement measures to improve take-up and ease of entry to the scheme.

I should be grateful if the Paymaster General could tell us whether any specific effort has been made to survey the 60 per cent. of eligible businesses to find out why they are not using the system. That is an obvious step to take. It may well be that the answer to that question—why businesses are not using the scheme—which does not appear on the Customs and Excise consultation paper on the operation of the scheme, is pertinent and the right route to finding a way towards higher take-up and thereby more benefits to small businesses in Britain.

Small businesses have been going through a difficult time. The VAT regime is often experienced as a real headache, making things harder for business rather than easier. We do not dispute that there are a number of measures in the Finance Bill that will help small businesses. We advocated those measures, and they are to be welcomed.

The Government need to accept that there is a long way to go as far as small businesses are concerned. That was underlined in a timely fashion by the publication today of a report by Grant Thornton which surveyed the opinions on economic prospects of small and medium-sized enterprises across the European Community. The report makes sorry reading. When such reports are published, it is important to underline that they do not tell the whole story about Britain's small businesses—many of them are thriving against all the odds. Labour Members certainly have no interest in talking down prospects for our small firms—we acknowledge that many are doing well.

The survey shows that many small businesses are gloomy about their prospects. The Press Association report on the survey says:

"Britain's small and medium-sized businesses are among the gloomiest in the EC about future prospects . . . there is pessimism about turnover, employment and investment—and Britain is the only country where research and development spending is expected to fall. It also has the weakest forecast for spending on training".

The survey, which covered 5,000 businesses throughout the Community, underlines the severity of the problems which firms in Britain and elsewhere in the Community face with late payments. There seemed to be vulnerability to pressures on finance arising from the problem of late payers.

The widening skills gap is underlined in the report. That is one area where the United Kingdom comes out badly. It is bad news at a time when small businesses in Britain need help with upskilling their employees and with the advice available to the management of small firms. Another relevant outcome of the survey is that the size of management teams in small firms in Britain is, on average, much greater than that of their European competitors. That inevitably means that a higher proportion of costs is spent on management, with a consequent undermining of competitiveness.

The findings of the survey bear out everything that the Labour party has been saying about the need for the British economy to have more investment in infrastructure and skills and more support for our small businesses. The Paymaster General should tell the Committee what action the Government will take on the findings of the survey. He should also respond to the question which he did not have an opportunity to answer in the turmoil and somewhat torrid time that he was having at the end of yesterday's debate: what will be the effect of the increase in VAT on small firms—those businesses that people have started from home which are not paying any VAT on their fuel at present because they do not use more than 40 per cent. of their fuel consumption for business purposes? The imposition of VAT on fuel will hit those small businesses. The Paymaster General owes the Committee an explanation as to how the Government can possibly impose that measure on those businesses. He also owes the firms involved an apology.

If the Government want small businesses to thrive, they must take action. As I suggested, they need to act to improve the overall economic position and climate that small businesses face. They also need to act specifically with regard to the consequences of bad debts for creditor firms. There are other provisions in the Bill with regard to small businesses, and we shall have a good deal to say about them—notably, the provisions relating to the VAT penalty regime and the right of recourse to VAT tribunals.

The Government need to take action to tackle the underlying causes which are giving rise to escalating bad debts. Those causes are fundamentally to be found in the consequences of recession and the fragility of recovery which still sees 1,200 businesses going under every week. Unemployment still casts an unacceptably long shadow over prospects for business recovery because of the greatly depressed purchasing power of the unemployed and because the fear of unemployment continues to corrode general confidence. Labour Members must stress the importance of tackling the causes of business failure and bad debt as well as the symptoms.

Small businesses add up to big business and they deserve every support. Labour's policies to that end are being developed further in consultation with small businesses. The key elements on which the construction of a supportive framework for small businesses need to focus were spelt out by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) in a speech to the Small Business Development conference in April.

Those elements are, first, finance—the need to free small businesses from dependency on short-term and expensive finance and from excessive exposure to personal risk by encouraging longer-term financial support and an equity share on the part of banks. Secondly, there must be improved advice and encouragement for the development of managerial skills. I have already referred to that matter in the context of the Grant Thornton survey. Thirdly, there must be better support for technology transfer, technological innovation and bringing new ideas to the market place. We believe that, with a supportive fiscal framework and a proper overall strategy for economic growth, infrastructure, investment and training, small businesses will have an even more important role to play in securing Britain's economic recovery and sustainable prosperity.

With regard to the specific provisions in clause 48, a further reduction, to three months, in the elapsed time for eligibility for VAT bad debt relief would give more help to the cash flow of many businesses, thereby staunching job losses and boosting confidence and recovery. I commend the amendment to the Committee.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): It might be helpful to the Committee if I intervene at this point to talk specifically about clause 48 and the amendment. The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) ranged a good deal wider than that to other subjects relating to small businesses. I may refer to some of those wider aspects at the end of the debate if I have a further opportunity.

The Committee will appreciate that the Government have given a good deal of attention to the problems of VAT and small businesses, especially in relation to bad debts, over the past year that I have been doing this job and, indeed, under my predecessor. I have long been involved in the support of small businesses. I am anxious to ensure that VAT is fairly operated and takes account of the difficulties of businesses, especially cash flow difficulties.

Customs and Excise has experienced increased bad debts in the form of VAT arrears. That is not surprising in a time of recession. The House may have seen from the Customs and Excise annual report covering the last fiscal year, which was published not long ago, that arrears increased, in spite of some special measures, from 4·2 to 4·4 per cent. The Public Accounts Committee has rightly and fairly criticised those arrears.

It is essential, if we are to be fair to those who pay their VAT on time, that we collect the VAT due from their competitors as promptly as possible. It is not fair to the majority for us to allow a minority to postpone their obligations, particularly in cases where the trader has collected the VAT from his own customers—I am thinking especially of retail businesses—and then fails to hand it over to the Customs and Excise when it is due.

Conversely, we also recognise the problems of some traders, especially when they have not been paid by their customers. That is the problem to which the clause is directed. As the hon. Member for Oxford, East correctly said, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken two specific measures in the Budget to help people in that position. First, he has widened and improved the cash accounting scheme. Secondly, he has made bad debts easier to write off for VAT purposes.

The promised improvements in the cash accounting scheme can be put in place by order and administrative action. They do not require clauses in the Finance Bill. So there will not be an opportunity to mention them at another stage. The threshold has been raised to a turnover of £350,000 per annum. Traders whose turnover rises up to 25 per cent. above that can remain in the scheme until they come out of the top end. All that takes place under the VAT (Cash Accounting) (Amendment) Regulations 1993, which took effect on 1 April 1993.

Not only that statistical change has occurred. We have also made changes to the arrangements for the scheme so that any trader whose turnover is below the new threshold can automatically use the cash accounting system without having to apply for and receive approval, as he previously did. Clearly, if it turns out that he was not eligible, he has to put the matter right later. We have tried to get rid of the bureaucracy involved in signing up to the cash accounting scheme.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East asked me about the consultation with the trade organisations, which is now in progress. We have asked for responses to the consultation by 31 May. We shall consider carefully the responses that we receive as soon as possible thereafter.

We have done a certain amount to publicise the cash accounting scheme especially to new traders. The packs for new traders include advertisements explaining the scheme and the other schemes available to traders. Further details are offered to anyone who is interested to know more. We have drawn the scheme to the attention of practitioners, banks and so on, so that they can advise clients about the scheme and tell them to take advantage of it, if it is desirable and if they wish to do so. We have conducted various exercises to publicise the scheme among traders who might wish to benefit from it.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East mulled over why more traders who, on paper, are eligible for the scheme do not take it up. When one ponders the matter one sees that there are some fairly obvious reasons why some do not choose to take up the scheme. First, the retail schemes and other related schemes for retailers are better for some small businesses. It is not necessary for them to take up the cash accounting scheme to obtain similar benefits or benefits that they consider more desirable in making their arrangements for VAT. For some traders who take cash over the counter, there is no advantage in the cash accounting scheme in dealing with bad debts.

If one does business for cash, by definition one does not have any bad debts—unless one takes some dud notes—so some people do not become involved in the cash accounting scheme. It may be better for some traders from the input point of view not to be in the cash accounting scheme, depending how promptly they pay their suppliers and whether supplies are provided on credit.

Some traders find that the Inland Revenue cash accounting scheme does not blend as easily as it might with the VAT cash accounting scheme. They prefer not to be involved in the VAT scheme, for that reason. Some additional accounting is required to keep the accounts on the basis that we require—necessarily, I believe—so that we can operate the scheme with due regard to the revenue.

Apart from the cash accounting scheme, which is highly desirable and which we have improved and extended in the

[Sir John Cope]

Budget, my right hon. Friend and I were also anxious to improve the position of those who have bad debts and are VAT traders. That is the reason for clause 48 and the provisions that we are considering.

The present scheme was introduced by section 11 of the Finance Act 1990. Before then, there was a scheme of VAT relief for bad debts. It depended on the formal insolvency of the debtor. That led to difficulties. Apart from anything else, it provided a VAT incentive to traders to go through the formal insolvency procedures to get back the VAT, and for no other reason. That was correctly regarded as an unnecessary incentive to go through the formal insolvency procedures. That was partly why the new scheme was introduced in the Finance Act 1990.

Initially, the cash accounting scheme provided eligibility for relief on all debts in respect of supplies that were made after 1 April 1989 which were two years old and were written off in the trader's accounts.

A clawback provision still exists in respect of belated payments received by claimants. A debt may be regarded as bad at a certain time, but the trader may still chase it and he may succeed in getting some of the money back. We would obviously need to recover the VAT in that case.

The waiting period was reduced from two years to one year before the scheme came into full effect under section 15 of the Finance Act 1991. The new scheme has been generally welcomed and it has been discussed in the House and in Committee on a number of occasions. Representations have been made, however, from professional and business organisations and individuals about the fact that the waiting period is too long. Given the recession, those representations have had greater validity because of the cash flow problems that have thus been caused. We have responded to those representations with the proposal in the Bill to reduce the waiting period from one year to six months.

8.30 pm

The decision to halve the waiting period is a reflection of the attention paid to the representations made and significantly enhances a scheme that has already led to a major improvement for businesses chasing bad debts. The one-year cost of the scheme—it is only one year because the scheme brings forward the time at which bad debts are written off—is estimated at £150 million. In other words, the cash flow of those businesses affected by bad debt has been improved by £150 million as a result of the Government's efforts in the current financial year.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East has suggested that we should reduce the waiting period from six months to three months, but I do not believe that it would be wise to pursue that proposal. If it is possible to write off a bad debt too soon after that debt is incurred, the necessary provisions will become unduly bureaucratic and difficult. The necessary clawback of debts paid after the end of the proposed 90-day period would increase considerably.

We must remember that different types of businesses use different credit arrangements. Credit of 90 days is not unusual in some lines of business. If the amendment of the hon. Member for Oxford, East were accepted, it would mean that every debt that was more than one day or a week outstanding after 90 days could be written off for VAT. That VAT would then need to be clawed back at a later date.

I should make it clear that any waiting period, be it six months or, were we to accept the amendment, which I do not recommend, three months, runs from the day of supply. It runs from when the goods are delivered and the invoice arrives. The period does not run from when the credit allowed by the supplier has expired. I do not believe that VAT should be written off as early as three months after the date of supply, because that would add to the control problems of Customs and Excise when managing write-offs. It is necessary to establish that a debt is genuinely bad. Just because someone has been a bit dilatory in coming up with the money does not make for a bad debt. That is why the waiting period of six months is appropriate.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Why is it more difficult to validate that the debt is a genuine bad debt when it is reclaimed after three months rather than after six? Surely the same evidence will be available for the VAT inspectors.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the increased bureaucracy that that shorter period would impose on a business. I certainly do not see why the VAT inspectors or businesses should be subject to any more bureaucracy. If a business wanted to operate a 90-day or an even longer credit system, it would have that choice under our proposals. It would be up to businesses to decide whether to reclaim VAT after three months, six months or longer. Although our amendment would enable businesses to make a claim after three months, it would not preclude them, from choice, from deciding to wait longer, if they operate an extended system of credit. Surely our amendment gives business more choice than the right hon. Gentleman has tried to suggest.

Sir John Cope: Yes, in some senses it does, but a business will have to decide whether to place itself at a disadvantage in comparison with some of its competitors by not reclaiming the VAT as soon as it could, as proposed under the hon. Gentleman's amendment. At the same time, a business would have to be sure that it got its clawback right. From our point of view and that of Customs and Excise, we would also need to try to be sure that no bad debt that had been written off at the end of three months had not been paid afterwards. From a technical point of view, that is quite a difficult thing to do. I speak as a former auditor who had to go over transactions and find out what happened. Sometimes it is difficult to be certain that a debt has not been paid belatedly.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East picked up my phrase about validating a debt as genuinely bad. There is no validation of the kind to which he referred, for example through the production of some documents to demonstrate that a debt is bad. The only validation that is required under the scheme is the length of time during which the debt has been in existence; in other words, from the date of supply until the six months period has expired. Providing that the debt has been outstanding for six months, no further validation in terms of documents is required.

For the scheme to be simple and easy to operate from the point of view of the trader and Customs and Excise, it is wise that a simple period of time should elapse. That provides reasonable protection and it is not necessary to provide further validation. That is why I believe that the period should be set at six months as opposed to three months.

At the time of the review of bad debt relief in 1988, when the scheme was introduced, an extensive consultation exercise was undertaken. Most of those who replied accepted the need for a waiting period and their views on the length of that period ranged from a maximum of two years, which is what the Government then introduced, to a minimum of six months. At that stage, no one requested a waiting period of three months and there has been no pressure for it since.

The expressed wish of those who were consulted is met by clause 48. To guard against the danger of fraudulent abuse, particularly by associated companies and connected persons—we must always think about those who would try to use, for fraudulent reasons, provisions in the tax law that were introduced for genuine reasons—six months is the right waiting period for the scheme.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East referred to quite a number of other, wider matters. I may respond to them more fully later, if time allows. In connection with the late payment of debt and the Government's own position, Government accounting now requires Departments to pay bills promptly in accordance with the terms of the contract or within 30 days of the receipt of goods and services or presentation of a valid invoice, whichever is the later, if no other terms are specified.

The Chancellor announced in his 1992 Budget that prime contractors to Government Departments would in future be required to include in their contracts with sub-contractors a clause committing them to pay promptly. The hon. Member for Oxford, East referred to some of the difficulties encountered in introducing and enforcing that provision across the public sector. New arrangements are being introduced by, for example, the Property Services Agency Building Management businesses to ensure that sub-contractors are paid promptly, within 30 days of the validation of the invoice.

A recent survey, to which the hon. Gentleman may have referred indirectly, by the Heating and Ventilating Contractors Association suggested a poor performance by the PSA. It predated the new arrangements and does not reflect their effect. There have been reports in answer to parliamentary questions on the performance of individual Departments, and they show that in 80 to 90 per cent. of cases the majority of Departments are already within the new arrangements, but it is only 12 months since their introduction and we are trying to improve the performance of individual Departments. As the hon. Gentleman himself mentioned, we are giving information on payment performance in departmental reports as well as in comprehensive parliamentary answers.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to an interesting report in this morning's Financial Times about a Grant Thornton survey of small and medium enterprises and their prospects in the European Community. I also noticed that report and have asked to see particulars of the survey. We will consider it carefully and see what lessons it has for us and what we should do, if anything, to address the problems that it throws up, on my side at least, as far as VAT is concerned. There may be wider lessons for other parts of Government.

In the early stages of what I had to say I referred to the problems of bad debt for both traders and Customs and Excise in a time of cash flow difficulties for us both, and the necessity of addressing those difficulties, particularly where small firms are concerned. The hon. Member for Oxford, East expressed a strong belief in small businesses and in the bigger part that they will play—bigger even than in recent years—in the recovery from recession to future economic prosperity.

I am glad to have been associated with the small business lobby in the House since before I even became an hon. Member, and I am very glad that small businesses have been able to contribute so much to the economy in the past decade. I am particularly pleased that the Labour party has come round so strongly to the support of small businesses and that it is promoting ideas such as the hon. Gentleman has put forward today to encourage them to build up. Although not earth-shattering, the clause is an important step in that direction, as are the changes in the cash accounting scheme introduced in the Budget by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. I commend the clause to the Committee, but, for the reasons that I have given, I do not recommend that the Committee goes as far as to insert "three months" into the Bill.

8.45 pm

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): The importance of the amendment that Opposition Members are putting forward is that it allows us to focus on the problems of late payment and bad debt facing many of Britain's 5 million small businesses and to consider the proposed changes to the VAT regime designed to ameliorate the problems that small businesses experience, especially when firms have already paid VAT on moneys owing to them that have become bad debts. No hon. Member will have been left unaware of the problems and demands of small businesses. I certainly have not, since I was elected last year. Many feel as if they are running not only their own businesses but a separate business dealing with the VAT inspectors, the paperwork, the bureaucracy and the appeals that are involved.

Many experience and complain about the often punitive fines which they incur and which equal the earnings in a given week. No doubt VAT men and women are badly misunderstood people, but it must be recognised that many are viewed as tyrants by the small business people who have to deal with the VAT authorities, and it behoves us hon. Members to try to do all that we can to build a bridge between the oppressed and the oppressors. Clause 48 represents the latest attempt to help small businesses by changing the VAT bad debt regulations by making VAT relief on bad debts more readily available. Although it is to be welcomed, it is only part of what is necessary to give greater support to the small business sector. The importance of the small business sector for the British economy has already been stressed. Ninety-five per cent. of all businesses in the United Kingdom employ fewer than 20 people . About half the work force—11 million people—work in small firms. Small firms contribute more than a quarter of the nation's gross domestic product. Small firms have rightly been called the engine room of Britain's economy, and since the war it is small businesses that have provided the fastest growth, the greatest job creation and the most dynamic technological innovation. Their needs are, therefore, a priority for our attention, and recognition of their needs crosses party boundaries and makes absolutely futile the argument that some like to have about whether their party is more pro-small firm than the other. I was grateful for the Paymaster General's commendation of the strong support that the modern Labour party gives to small businesses.

In the light, however, of what the Paymaster General said, I was amazed to read, prior to this debate, a debate on 13 November 1992 on small and medium-sized enterprises, initiated by the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), during which his fellow bright spark the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan Smith) tried to claim that small business

"drives to the heart of Conservative philosophy"

"small businesses are really about individuals, about dreams and aspirations" and therefore

"solid Conservative principles are at the heart of the matter."

For sheer lack of logic—some would say claptrap—his comments are difficult to beat, especially as he failed to go on and point out how many small firms' dreams have been smashed and aspirations broken on the back of the Tories' recession.

A more accurate summing up of the position regarding small firms was offered by the hon. Member for Colchester, North—obviously a shrewd judge with a brilliant future behind him—when he said:

"it is small firms that feel most under pressure in the recession, most put upon by the banks, most burdened by regulation and most neglected by Government policy."—[Official Report, 13 November 1992; Vol. 213, c. 1084-143.]

I could not have put it better myself. Our task this evening, across the party divide, is to do what we can to unburden small businesses while observing the standards of employment practice shown in the best small firms. That is the aim of clause 48 and amendment No. 41.

Since that debate last November, the pressure of the recession seems to have eased somewhat—thank goodness for that—although it will take many years to undo the damage caused to small firms by it. There is still a long way to go to unburden small firms fully. It is worth pointing out that, as recovery picks up, some small firms will be experiencing fresh and different financial demans on them, exacerbating the existing problem of bad debt.

The Financial Times headlined a story on 4 May, saying:

"Upturn that can spell business ruin."

It explained that the increase in orders that may come about as recovery picks up could mean the final strain on the recession-stretched finances of firms that have high borrowing levels and many late payments outstanding. That point was expanded in a speech made the next day by the director general of the CBI, Howard Davies, who observed:

"small firms' cashflow is so finely balanced that sales growth can put some of them out of business through cash shortages."

A similar comment was made by the chairman of the CBI's small firms council who said:

"over the last year, record numbers of small firms have had difficulties in raising external finance. If these difficulties continue, they will seriously limit their performance and hamper plans for investment and expansion."

It is important to note those concerns, to start preparing for that eventuality and to identify ways to assist small firms in such circumstances.

Bad debts represent a relatively small proportion of firms' finances, but they are an additional and, for many, a critical burden. They are why, in the overall context of small firms' financial needs, it is necessary to make renewed efforts to solve the problem of late payments of debts and why it is important to reduce the waiting period for eligibility for VAT bad debt relief, as both the clause and the amendment would.

VAT payers should have to wait the minimum time possible before they are able to recover VAT payments that they have made on accounts that go bad. That is the aim of the amendment. That action needs to go hand in hand with wider support for small firms at a local level. There is little point in making the changes concerning bad debt and creating the easier conditions for small firms that we are discussing tonight if so much else is not going right, or not right enough, for small firms. I shall give a few examples of what I mean.

Small firms rely on local advice about bad debt and other help to assist their growth. The Government have wisely launched their one-stop shop initiative. Never mind that the scheme introduced by the President of the Board of Trade mirrors almost precisely the ideas that were set out by the Labour party and were originally described by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) in an article in The Independent on 24 April 1990.

Why has the Government's initiative made so little progress? I am glad that the DTI hopes, as it said this week, that the first of the 23 shops, which will give much needed advice on bad debt as well as on other matters relating to VAT, will be set up by July. However, as the Financial Times remarked yesterday:

"On present plans, the government's proposals will take years to implement."

It is hard to believe that we cannot move faster. After all, the original announcement was made in the House on 3 December.

The problem of late payments—a close cousin of bad debt—is still acute. Small companies have little muscle to ensure that they are paid on time and are often particularly vulnerable to a single large debt. Recent surveys have shown that the United Kingdom's bill payment record is noticeably worse than that of the rest of Europe. That was confirmed in the survey to which my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) referred. Despite trade initiatives such as the CBI prompt payer code, there is a need to have a statutory right to interest on unpaid bills. I urge the Government to re-examine that option. I hope that the Paymaster General, if he speaks again in the debate, will offer the Government's views on that matter.

Underpinning any VAT regime that accommodates the problems of small businesses must be a fair and open appeals procedure in the event of disputes about reclaiming VAT on business expenses. Clause 48 needs to be seen alongside another provision in the Bill. Another clause places on appellants the new burden of having to prove not only that they are right in the eyes of the law but that Customs and Excise acted "unreasonably". That seems unreasonable. Such is the difficulty of proving "unreasonable" in law that the clause has been called "outrageous" by Coopers and Lybrand. I think that it tilts the appeals procedure against the taxpayer, contravening the spirit of the Government's taxpayers charter. It should be reconsidered and I hope that the Paymaster General will tell us, either tonight or when we return to the matter in Committee, whether the Government are prepared to do that.

At the time of the Budget, there was some press criticism of the Chancellor for introducing a mixed package of VAT reforms, some helpful and some that did not go far enough in the view of small business organisations. Our amendment shows how the bad debt change could be taken a step further. I would also urge a close examination of the cash accounting scheme under which businesses with a turnover of below £300,000 are eligible to pay no VAT until they receive payment from their customers. That is extremely relevant to the issue that we are debating. That would be the best indemnity against bad debt, because the businesses taking advantage of the scheme account for VAT on the basis of payment received and made rather than on the tax invoices issued and money received, or not. In that way, the problem of reclaiming VAT on bad debts need not arise in the first place, which is why it is such a useful scheme and one that is so important for many small businesses.

I welcome the raising of the eligibility ceiling to £350,000; none the less, conditions for entry to the scheme remain restrictive. Quite often, that is because of the bad debt trouble that small firms already experience. I hope that the Government will examine further the administration of the scheme and look closely at ways to draw more businesses to it, including raising the ceiling further. At present, Customs and Excise estimate that only 40 per cent. of eligible traders are in the scheme.

The lesson of the past decade is that, even in the most enterprising business sector, Government support and action are vital for success. The Government concentrated their attention on that matter and their help to small businesses during the 1980s—I do not gainsay the assistance that they offered during that time—concentrated largely on start-up advice. That now needs to embrace greater help not simply to nurture the start-up of small firms but to promote their growth.

Without doubt, the greatest blow to small businesses has been the recession, which has been a disaster, a hurricane which has wiped out vast stretches of the small business sector and the enterprise culture. In Hartlepool, more than 130 small businesses have gone under in the past three years, 30 of them in vital industrial sectors. In the past 12 months, 55 companies have closed, although my recent meetings with the town's business people give some cause for cautious optimism that things are starting to improve. I certainly hope that they will.

If business confidence and order books are growing, as I hope that they are, and if they are to be sustained, now is the time to do everything possible to assist the growth of small businesses. The high street banks have a considerable responsibility in that.

Greater long-term attention must be paid to the way in which small businesses are financed. That is an old and much debated issue which is familiar to Opposition Members who are concerned about small businesses; none the less, it has been insufficiently acted on by the banks and has been given insufficient encouragement by the Government.

The banks are often cast as villains, but recently I met representatives of NatWest and my impression was that some banks at least are more open to ideas on different ways of working, including increased debt-for-equity swaps, than they have been in the past. Those and other options desperately need to be driven forward if we are to nurture and sustain the small business sector that we so desperately need for the success of our economy in future. I hope that the proposals and ideas will be put forward on the back of the Finance Bill and its proposals on bad debt relief and other changes.

I hope that the Government will see fit—if not tonight, then on future occasions—to give rather more positive consideration to the amendment.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has the pleasure of supporting the clause because, like many people, I know only too well of all the care, consideration and help that he has given small businesses throughout his parliamentary career. My right hon. Friend is on much safer ground than he was last night, when he was faced with a volatile and noisy Committee, and he has great experience in these matters.

I remind the Committee that we are discussing clause 48 which reduces the waiting period for eligibility for VAT bad debt relief from one year to six months. That is achieved in two ways. Clause 48(1) amends section 11(1)(c) of the Finance Act 1990 by reducing the elapsed time required for eligibility from one year to six months. What is also important, and has not yet been mentioned, is the alteration under subsection (2) which allows the reduced waiting period to have effect from 1 April 1993 in relation to supplies made on or after 1 April 1992.

I have often heard it said that large companies dine out on the overdrafts of small companies and I am sure that that is right. When companies have cash flow problems they make every possible excuse for not meeting their payments. Those excuses range from the mildest, such as that the cheque is in the post, to much stronger excuses. But cheques arrive unsigned and have to be sent back, thereby giving the company another week, or the totals are not written in, so the cheques go back.

People may phone up the accounts department of another company that owes them money, only to be told, "We cannot pay your £6,000 invoice until we get paid." I should like to think that many companies then ask, "How much can you afford to pay?". If the reply is, "We can only pay £3,000 until we get paid", smaller firms in particular should reply, "Well, pay us the £3,000." If everyone did that, money would begin to circulate and cash flow problems would be eased throughout the business sector, wages would be paid and banks would take the pressure off companies. It is one thing to suffer debt; it is another to lock up bad debt for a whole year. That is a long time for a company to wait, especially one experiencing cash flow problems.

Earlier, Opposition Members levelled accusations at the Government, blaming them for the fact that companies were struggling. The world recession is common knowledge, but we should remember that companies are robbed of jobs by such developments as mechanisation and automation. For instance, there was a time when every bus had a conductor; now the driver takes the money, and thousands of jobs have been lost. Similarly, railway booking offices used to contain any number of ticket sellers; now there may be one such employee, and travellers must buy their tickets from machines. There used to be a man at the barrier in the underground station; now passengers feed their tickets into the machine. Even when passengers want to leave the station that is their destination, a machine must swallow their tickets before they can do so.

Years ago, people did all those jobs, but we must not struggle against change. The small businesses of today are the big businesses of tomorrow. When the railways were built, the farriers, those who made tack for the horses, the wheelwrights and people who made carriages threw up their hands in horror, saying, "We will be out of business." Many of them were, but at every railway station W. H. Smith put up a newspaper stand.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I always hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he is straying very wide of the subject of debt. I hope that he will relate his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Dickens: May I finish my little story? It is relevant.

Suddenly, small companies began to mushroom following the setting up of those bookstalls—companies producing newspapers, magazines and books, which are now sold by the thousand at railway stations. They created many more jobs than had been lost to those connected with horses and carriages. That is an example of the way in which mighty companies can grow from little acorns.

The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) made a good point. He said that there might be difficult days ahead for small businesses with debts. That is true. Unfortunately, until recently, the banks were pulling the plug rather quickly on small companies with cash flow problems, because their overdrafts were secured on assets such as buildings and land. As the property market began to slip and such assets became less valuable—especially in the south—they ceased to match those small companies' overdrafts. The banks began to fidget and to look for more security in other areas, driving the small companies into the ground.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, a greater danger lies ahead—a danger closely connected with debt. Small companies will want to buy more materials as the recession draws to a close and the market grows—we hope that we are now emerging completely from recession—in order to add value, to produce goods to sell and to increase their profits. Will the banks allow those companies to extend their overdrafts, which are running at the upper limits, so that they can buy the material that they need?

In the early days, the banks were pulling the plug because they felt that they could sell buildings and land more easily than small companies that were struggling. In the event, they found that they could not. What will happen when the assets grow in value to match the overdraft facility? Will the banks run for cover and pull the plug? In Germany, banks take equity in companies and run with them. Here, the banking mentality is different.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. That is all very interesting, but what has it to do with debt in small companies? The hon. Gentleman should confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Dickens: I am obliged to you, Mr. Lofthouse. I thought that I was dealing with debt and the problems of small businesses. Before you resumed the Chair, we had a much wider debate, and I was endeavouring to answer points which were raised. I will accede to your request, since I have the greatest respect for you and the Chair.

Small businesses have already welcomed the proposal on bad debt in the Budget. The period of three months suggested by the Opposition is much too short. It cannot be said that a debt becomes a bad debt in such a short time. Companies like a sporting chance. When two companies have been dealing with each other for many years, one understands that the other is trying to keep its promise to pay and it would not want to regard a debt as a bad debt after only three months.

In some contracts, 90 days is the normal period for settling an account. It is going too far to suggest that an outstanding bill becomes a bad debt after three months. A period of six months is ideal.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Can my hon. Friend explain why accountants often recommend that their clients should include in contracts a clause giving 10 per cent. off if a bill is paid in a certain period, but the accountants themselves and other professional people never knock 10 per cent. off their bills? Would that not be a good idea?

Mr. Dickens: Hon. Members will correct me if I am wrong, but I always thought that accountants made assumptions. People are going down a slippery slope when they start to give discounts. If a small business gave 10 per cent. discount, it would begin to work at distress rates and it would get into real difficulty.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton): I must come to the defence of accountants. I express an interest because my husband is an accountant. He gives the most generous discounts.

Mr. Dickens: I will not be tempted into an argument by saying that sometimes people must overcharge to be able to give large discounts. I am too generous of disposition to go down that road in a debate which must concentrate on clause 48.

I have made a sensible contribution. I always gain favour by leaving time for other hon. Members to make their contributions. I hope that theirs will be as sensible as mine.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I hope that the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) will get a gold star in the Whips' book to follow the black mark that he got yesterday. His turn round could scarcely be equalled for speed, if not necessarily for the quality of his contribution—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] —although it was entertaining.

Mr. Mandelson: Withdraw.

Mr. Taylor: I do not think that it is necessary to withdraw. Opposition Members are supportive of the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth, but I do not want to go too wide of the amendment and be called to order by the Chair.

The debate is important to small businesses, a subject in which I am particularly interested. There are many small businesses and self-employed people in my constituency. Indeed, the Liberal Democrats currently represent many areas, such as Cornwall and Bath, containing a high proportion of small businesses. My hon. Friends and I have over the years raised the concerns of small businesses and have argued the case on their behalf in respect of bad debt and VAT payments.

9.15 pm

Clause 48 is a welcome pro-small business move and is designed to help cash flow. Businesses will have to wait less time to get back from Customs and Excise the VAT paid in respect of goods and services already sold but not paid for. As I have said, it is a welcome move which will be supported in all parts of the Committee. It will be particularly welcome to small businesses which have witnessed the stern and unbending hand of the penalties for late payment of VAT. They will be pleased to see matters turning more in their favour.

I have recently been dealing with the case of a small business in my constituency. The firm posted a VAT return in time but it was not received by the VAT office because of a dispute there. That meant that the post had not been processed. Even so, the firm is being asked to pay a fine and has been told, in effect, "Had you posted it earlier, it would have arrived before the industrial dispute." That seems harsh, and I shall be contacting the Minister once the small business in question has had time to digest that reply and got over the shock.

The measure now proposed by the Government is more generous. There is a connection between the VAT relief for bad debt and the VAT cash accounting scheme. Whereas the VAT relief applies to most companies, for the smallest companies which elect for VAT cash accounting there is no waiting period because they pay the VAT only when they get paid.

If the VAT cash accounting scheme applied to more businesses, VAT relief would be needed only for larger companies, which are generally more able to cope with cash flow problems. The Government brought the scheme into existence in 1987 and have increased the threshold in this Budget. That is welcome. The threshold for eligibility to the scheme will now be £350,000.

Liberal Democrats argue in our alternative budget that the threshold would be more appropriately increased to £1 million, so achieving a clear difference between companies which find it difficult to meet cash flow problems arising from bad debt and larger companies which are more able to absorb relatively small-scale problems as they proceed through their normal course of business.

Has the Minister explored the possibility of increasing further the threshold on the VAT cash accounting scheme, thus giving more help to more small companies? That would give more help than the Labour amendment would achieve. The only cost to the Exchequer would be a cash flow cost. Although it might under EC rules require a derogation, the Minister should explore that area because it would make a real difference to a large number of companies which, by any normal definition, remain small, albeit they are outside the limits of the scheme.

While the clause deals with one Government-related problem of bad debt, there is a much larger private sector problem concerned with the late payment of debt. Indeed, the day-to-day problem that most businesses in Cornwall have mentioned to me is late payment of commercial debt. When a firm's business customers do not pay their bills on time, the cash flow problems can have so many other effects in terms of higher costs and pressure from the bank that the firm can end up closing down, with knock-on effects for its suppliers.

I recall leaning against a gate by the travelling surgery that I conduct in villages around my constituency talking to a builder who had been put out of business precisely because of the problem that I have described. He simply could not understand the attitude that had been taken not just by the Government but by various bodies with which he had had to deal. He felt that there was so little understanding of the problem that he had been put out of business through no fault of his own. He had indeed done the job well; it was merely the payment that had not come through.

Some might ask what the late payment of commercial debt has to do with the Government. Is it not, they ask, up to the firms involved to sort themselves out? The evidence goes against this purist, non-interventionist view, however. Despite years of exhortation to firms to pay their bills promptly, on the part of the Government and of business organisations such as the CBI, a recent survey by the Association of British Factors and Discounters showed that the average repayment period was now 80 days. A similar survey conducted last December by Trade Indemnity, the credit insurer, found that only 3 per cent. of nearly 600 firms contacted were being paid on time. In 1991, the Forum for Private Business estimated that small companies were owed more than £100 million in overdue debt.

The recovery may reduce the scale of the problem, and the latest quarterley review of the Association of British Factors and Discounters suggests that that is happening. If so, it is certainly welcome, but the problem will not go away. A report by the National Westminster bank in yesterday's Financial Times found the picture as bad as ever; and today's Financial Times quotes a study by the Manchester business school showing that, because of the recession in some European countries, some United Kingdom firms are finding it difficult to get continental customers to pay their bills on time, suggesting moreover that there may need to be action at European level to prevent unfair practices from taking hold in the single market. I hope that the Minister will make representations about the problem in Europe. This is a good example of a problem that will need to be tackled in future at that level.

However one considers the payment of commercial debt, there is clearly a problem. Although we welcome the provisions of clause 48, it shows that the Government are missing the larger picture in relation to late and bad debts.

There are some simple measures which firms can take themselves and which the Government can help to facilitate. First, many firms need to manage credit lines better. Often, companies can do more themselves, and the Government could encourage training and enterprise councils, and local enterprise companies in Scotland, to run courses in credit management for business people and their employees. If the one-stop shops develop as I hope that they will—we have long called for their development—I trust that they will take a lead in this area.

The Government could also make good their long-standing pledge to simplify the cumbersome and costly commercial debt recovery procedures so as to make legal redress for companies a realistic option. If they do so, the costs of this measure may fall as a result. A little money spent now may save the Government money in the longer term.

Even with such developments, however, I believe that late payment will remain a serious problem for small and medium-sized companies. The commercial fact of life is that larger firms can and do use their market power to scare their smaller suppliers into putting up with late payment. That abuse of market power suggests a role for competition policy and hence for some sort of Government intervention.

The Chancellor half acknowledged this problem when he announced in the pre-election Budget that new legislation would require larger companies to state in the notes to their accounts the average time taken to pay their bills. But the lack of understanding in the DTI of the seriousness of the problem was shown by the fact that it took almost a year for the Government to follow up that announcement with a consultation paper. In any case, shaming companies into paying their debts on time in this way is likely to prove ineffective. It might even prove counter-productive; those thinking of investing might inquire why payment was being made so quickly instead of pressing companies to pay more speedily.

So why not legislate for a statutory right to interest on debts outstanding after a certain period? The idea has received support in all parts of the House in the past, and it has been implemented in every European country bar the United Kingdom and Ireland. It is one measure that gets over the free-rider problem, ensuring that every firm has an incentive to comply. This measure would change the current awful culture of waiting until the very last minute before making payment. If the measure were in place, business men could devote their time to being business men instead of debt collectors.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Surely the hon. Gentleman knows that the reason for that idea not having been carried through and being treated with considerable reserve by many business organisations is that it is likely that if there were a compulsory right to interest, it would be enforced by the big companies against the small ones while the small companies would not dare to alienate their customers by acting similarly.

Mr. Taylor: That argument has been put forward before. My experience is that it is the big companies which resist the principle while the small ones argue for it. What I am suggesting for the United Kingdom is done in other European countries. I am sure that the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) will acknowledge that this debate takes place across parties as well as between them. However, I believe that he is wrong and that a great many small businesses agree with me.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman is probably aware that the Federation of Small Businesses—the biggest organisation for small businesses in this country, I believe—has declined to adopt the policy that he is putting forward. That body has identified the problem as being that, whether or not interest is charged, small companies ultimately have to go through the civil procedures of the British courts. That is what gives rise to most of the problems that small companies experience. They have to secure a judgment, but more often than not they also have to go back to have the judgment enforced. In the meantime, very often the bird has flown. That problem, too, must be addressed.

Mr. Taylor: I strongly agree with the hon. Lady. Indeed, I referred a few moments ago to the need to sort out a system of securing payment. I am sure that the hon. Lady, like me, receives many letters from small businesses that have obtained an order to secure payment but find that they have to go back to court. In many cases they are advised that it would simply be too costly to pursue the matter. Perhaps the Government could alter the title of the Criminal Justice (Amendment) Bill and introduce into it a provision to tackle this problem. Why wait?

The problems caused by bad debt are to only a very small degree solved by this clause. None the less, I welcome the fact that the Government are moving in the direction of change. Although there are some signs that we are coming out of recession, small businesses still have to face extremely harsh problems. Indeed, many people are still likely to lose their businesses. We have heard expressions of worry that it may take some years to recover properly from the recession. I am afraid that many people who have lost their businesses will never recover. We must consider all possible means of tackling this problem.

For many businesses in the south-west, the problems created by rising electricity, gas and water prices represent a more urgent and fundamental priority. None the less, this is an important measure, which is welcomed by my party.

Mrs. Browning: Payment on time and bad debt have been identified by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee as very important and serious, especially in relation to the cash flow of small businesses. My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) began by outlining the way in which many companies, particularly large companies, try to avoid payment when it becomes due, and he identified three or four of the most common excuses for non-payment.

I must declare an interest. Before becoming a Member of Parliament, I was a management consultant, and one of the areas in which I specialised was advice for companies in the United Kingdom and abroad on collection and credit control. It may be of assistance to my hon. Friend the Minister—as I am in a generous mood, perhaps I should say that it may be of interest to hon. Members on both sides of the Committee—if I say that I have a list of the 20 most common excuses used for non-payment, and I can tell hon. Members the response that one should make immediately to ensure that one is not floored by one of these excuses.

This is a serious matter. There are many reasons for the failure of companies to get their money on time. We have heard about the difficulties involved in dealing with large corporations. In many sectors, one sees the big stick being waved. This applies not least in the retail food chain, where small businesses supply the large supermarkets.

Such chains will often arbitrarily change the terms of a contract in mid-contract. An egg producer in my constituency was told by a large supermarket that the payment term that had previously been 30 days was to be changed to 60 without any question of renegotiation.

9.30 pm

We understand the difficulties and, ultimately, the cash flow problems that that means for small businesses, and I welcome the measure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has introduced on the treatment of debt and VAT. My right hon. Friend has already mentioned that it will mean an estimated £150 million benefit to the cash flow of businesses.

As the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and others have mentioned, the cash accounting scheme means that small businesses—previously those with a turnover of £300,000, now £350,000—will not have the problem, because they will be dealing on a cash accounting basis, and that is most welcome. I am aware, as I am sure is my right hon. Friend, that many small business organisations, in their representations to the Treasury before the Budget, particularly asked for this measure to be introduced.

I also know from consultations with Treasury Ministers before the Budget that, realising that it would be a difficult Budget with not a lot to give away, Conservative Members urged my right hon. Friend that anything that he could give should be given to the small business sector. This will be extremely welcome.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) mentioned debts and the ability to add interest to them. That can be negotiated, as long as it is done at the point of contract and not added retrospectively. I am sure that all hon. Members are aware that other members of the EC operate the scheme.

The hon. Member mentioned the difficulties that those countries are having. Again, I am prepared to share an experience with the Committee. In Italy, a letter to the local chamber of commerce resulted in the payment of a debt by return. Again, that suggests that other European countries are now suffering from the recession, and the payment of debts may become a more common problem.

In my own business experience of dealing with public limited companies and large corporations, right down to small businesses and sole proprietors, they are still reluctant, when they agree to do business with other businesses, to carry out the necessary credit controls and checks to ensure the creditworthiness of those with whom they are about to do business.

There are many examples of what can only be described as sloppy procedure on the part of companies. Sometimes it is not deliberate. The smaller the company, the busier are the people who run it. The sole proprietor of a small business has to sell and buy goods and deal with the documentation, and I can understand it if chasing up debts is put on the back burner. However, the longer a debt is left, the more likely it is that ultimately it will be written off, and that includes the VAT element as well. Many companies have been forced to do that: it is not a case of good business practice. That is a salutary lesson for any company to learn.

One has to be vigilant and efficient in getting money in on time. As someone who has, or had, a reputation to keep in this area—I occasionally write on the subject in periodicals—my terms were 30 days; on day 31, the person who owed me money received a telephone call from me before 10 am. I thoroughly commend that procedure to businesses, particularly small ones.

The measure reducing from one year to six months the waiting period for bad debt relief will be welcome. Hon. Members have identified areas associated with bad debt and business write-offs which are a burden on businesses. One of the difficulties that businesses have to face concerns the banks. The reduction of interest rates will help with the cash flow of businesses.

We are pleased that interest rates are coming down. However, one must sometimes question the banks' judgment when lending to small businesses, because they should realise that businesses may sink.

The hon. Member for Hartlepool gave examples of the difficulties that businesses face when they are expanding. Businesses get into debt because they do not have orders; they also get into debt because they are doing well. The hon. Gentleman outlined what we all recognise as over-trading. We shall have to address that problem as the economy picks up, and as businesses receive more orders and begin to grow again.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): The clause is obviously very welcome; the problem is that it does not go far enough. It has taken the Government five years to reduce the deadline for bad debt recovery from two years to six months. They should have gone rather further rather more quickly.

The amendment is designed to assist small businesses in particular. I was especially taken with the contribution by the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens), who spoke a lot of sense—I hasten to add the caveat, "on this one occasion"; I cannot say that I always agree with everything he says. The problems of small businesses that he outlined, such as access to finance and difficulties with bad debts, were pertinent. Before I came to the House, I worked in north Tyneside with small companies, both fledgling and expanding, and I know that the hon. Gentleman identified the problems accurately.

The problems that most often arose for small businesses were simple. They were lack of access to finance for expansion, especially in the range £250,000 to £1 million, in which venture capital is not available. That problem is especially acute in the peripheral regions, including my own, because venture capital is overwhelmingly concentrated in the south-east. Companies also encountered problems with late payment and bad debts. Those were the problems that the companies most often identified.

For small companies, especially companies that seek to grow rapidly, bad debts and late payments can quickly become a death sentence. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) has already pointed out the ways in which the problems can become more acute at the beginning of a recovery. Small businesses cannot rely on retained surpluses or on profits. They probably have to rely on borrowing for investment, and on cash flow to support risk business.

We have heard about the positive steps that have been taken in expanding the limit to £350,000, which is welcome. However, I hope that the Paymaster General will take the opportunity to address the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) about the fact that many firms that qualify under the cash accounting scheme do not take advantage of its provisions. Approximately 200,000 small companies fall into that category. Hundreds of thousands of other small firms fall outside the £350,000 exemption which face similar difficulties.

There are 3 million small firms in this country, and there are 3 million self-employed people. They play a vital and expanding role in the nation's economy. Between 1987 and 1989, for example, firms with fewer than 10 employees were responsible for nearly half the jobs created. Small firms are often the most innovative and entrepreneurial, and they are often the most prone to take the biggest risks. They therefore need the most assistance. They have been badly treated in the recent years of recession. Between 1989 and 1992, there were almost 187,000 new VAT registrations, which was extremely good news. However, 240,000 VAT-registered businesses were deregulated, amounting to a net loss of about 53,000 companies.

[Mr. Alan Milburn]

As my hon. Friends have made clear, smaller companies are especially prone to bad debt problems. The finances of small companies suffer disproportionately from late payment.

The reasoning behind the amendment is simple: if the Government's claims about economic recovery and about the key role that small businesses will play in it are true, it is important that Ministers act to ensure that real stimuli are given to help that recovery. As the Financial Times article of a day or so ago suggested, there is a late payment culture in Britain. The problems that small businesses face as a result of late payments and bad debts are much more acute than those faced by their cousins on the continent. It is incumbent on the Government to play a positive role in intervening to overcome those problems

I am reminded of the famous and oft-quoted remarks of the President of the Board of Trade about intervening before each and every meal. The amendment gives the Government a real opportunity to do just that. I hope that the Minister will take it seriously. I hope that he will show his empathy with small businesses and his sympathy for those who have given their lives to create job opportunities and wealth by helping them to overcome some of the problems that beset them, through no fault of their own.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I apologise to the Committee for the fact that I was not here for the start of the debate. A constituent came to see me about difficulties in connection with the statementing of a child. Faced with such difficult situations, I put my constituents first, but I again apologise for not being here earlier.

As someone who has taken a great interest in small business for 16 or 17 years now, I can, I think with modesty, suggest that this is ground that has been galloped upon quite a few times. Although I do not recognise the amendment as a sensible proposal and will not support it if there is a Division, I welcome the opportunity it gives us to draw to the attention of the Committee and the nation the problems of small business debt.

Small businesses are the acorns from which oaks can grow. They are the employment generators of the future. In future, employment will come not from big businesses, which, as a result of robotics and information technology, will shed rather than generate jobs, but from smaller business with more labour-intensive requirements. It is small businesses that we should be encouraging at this stage.

I want to disabuse the Committee of the popular view that running a small business is easy. In fact, it is harder than running a big business. Someone running a small business must be able to understand VAT, health and safety legislation, the pay-as-you-earn system, national insurance and employment law. One has five minutes left at the end of the day in which to run the business itself and perhaps make a few shillings to pay VAT, the uniform business rate, national insurance and so on.

In small business, debt control is not easy and it is not good. During the past six months or so, I have been going around the regional centres of our banks. I have been unhappy with the banks' support for business over the past year or so. To my amazement, although I would not say that they have been fighting back—they are too delicate and too gentle for that—more than one bank has told me that, of its commercial clients who have turnovers of up to £1·2 million a year—I do not know why that is the figure used—only 10 per cent. produce a profit and loss account for every month's trading.

That is staggering. How anyone can go into small business and try to run a business without a monthly profit and loss account, I simply do not know; I find it incredible. If that is the case, every figure goes out the window when one starts talking about cash flow. It is small wonder that small businesses run into trouble on debt control, not because of malevolence or trying to fiddle things, but because they simply do not have the proper managerial tools.

I welcome the change from one year to six months. I welcome the Labour party's amendment as a method of opportunity to debate the matter. If Labour Members know anything at all about small business, they will not press the amendment to a vote tonight. If they do, that will show that they are completely ignorant of small business and are simply using it as a tool to debate a specific issue and make a specific point. The small business sector will be back safely in Conservative hands, because Labour Members do not understand it one iota.

The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson), who has obviously popped out to have some dinner or something, said that bad debt is a small proportion of the small business sector and its debts. That exposes an innocence of the small business world, because there is a real difficulty in distinguishing between the slow payer and the long payer in small business. My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) made a point about all the excuses that can be used to delay debt.

At the end of the day, one never knows whether a person will pay. One gets into the catch 22 position—does one want to lose customers or hope to get the money and then retain them and do more business?

Mr. Dickens: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Page: With respect to my hon. Friend, who made a powerful speech earlier, I am getting messages from afar that mean that I have literally one minute to go.

The pressure on small businesses to do business in recessison is almost irresistible. The measure introduced by the Government is exceptionally helpful, especially the provision that it will come into force on 1 April 1993 and apply to supplies that come in on or after 1 April 1992. That will give a valuable cash flow boost to those companies that accumulated debts during that period and help to go forward into the recovery that is now taking place.

I sincerely hope that Labour Members will not press their amendment tonight, but congratulate the Government on reducing the provision from one year to six months.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Labour Members are not fundamentally disagreeing with the Government's proposal on bad debts or, indeed, the other proposals in the Budget to assist small businesses. In our amendment, we are saying that the Government have not gone far enough. We do not believe that their proposals are unacceptable; they are unexceptional. They have missed so many opportunities to assist small firms, especially at a time when they have great problems with debt.

We are not simply dealing with small firms that tick on daily and yearly. We should be looking at the growing firms that can add to and create the industrial base for the future at a time when, even by the Government's forecast, investment in manufacturing in the United Kingdom at the end of this year will still be 10 per cent. lower than it was in 1989. We can see the scale of the problem that we want to address.

Clearly, there is a debt crisis in the United Kingdom. It is almost as though small firms are playing a bizarre game of pass the parcel. The problem is that, when the music stops and the firm ends up with the parcel, it ends up with a debt problem that cannot be resolved because of cash flow difficulties. The small firm then goes out of business. It passes on the parcel—it owes money to other firms, but cannot pay because it has gone out of business, so the next firm with the parcel is also overwhelmed by debt and goes out of business.

Time and again in my constituency I have seen how the failure of one firm spirals down to the failure of other firms. The game is a handicap. As Conservative Members said, small firms are handicapped as large firms take advantage of them and squeeze them harder on the supply of goods and payment times, to the advantage of larger organisations.

All too often in this debt crisis, we see not merely industrial failure. So often the borrowing of small firms is backed, because the banks put on pressure, by the only asset that owners have—their house. So often as constituency Members we see not merely the failure of small firms, but, as a result of the problems of negative equity, repossession of the property of the owner. That is a problem in this recession. But let us think what will happen in the next recession. Let us see what will happen in the recovery which we hope is starting. Who will go to the bank to borrow money when the requirement is to put up his house as the asset backing? Who will do that knowing that thousands of people have lost not merely their business but their home in this recession?

Where are the Government's proposals? I should like the Paymaster General to consider promoting an initiative to introduce equity lending and venture capital on a real scale into the funding of small enterprises in Britain. I have seen nothing in the Budget and heard nothing from the Government on that. Have they not listened to Howard Davies, who has said that just as the banks over-lent during the 1980s, there is a real danger that they will over-react and over-restrict their lending in the 1990s? If the banks do that, where else is the capital for small firms to come from?

Why have not the Government expanded the loan guarantee scheme on a massive scale or launched a Government initiative to release the resources of pension schemes for direct investment? Why do not the Government respond to the Confederation of British Industry, which has made proposals recently to address the issue of debt? The Government could create an independent debt tribunal to address the problems of debt recovery for small firms, to which the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) referred.

On the issue of swifter payments, why have not the Government considered the German scheme and introduced a national initiative to reduce payment times to protect small firms from pressure from larger firms? Why have not the Government introduced initiatives to swap debt for equity? Why have they not produced a replacement for the business expansion scheme operating through local investment vehicles, which the CBI has promoted? We do not want the sort of scheme that resulted in fake housing enterprises which were simply a vehicle for tax avoidance for so many people. But why have not the Government introduced a scheme to channel money into small enterprises?

Why do not the Government address the problem that 64 per cent. of venture capital goes into management buy-outs rather than start-ups or early stage funding? The Paymaster General said that so much had been achieved by small firms in Britain. So much more could be achieved if only the Government and the financial institutions got together and assisted the development of our future industrial base.

Mr. Batiste: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak, albeit briefly, in the debate on a subject on which I made my maiden speech some 10 years ago. The matter has by no means diminished in importance in those years. The common feature of virtually all the speeches by both Conservative and Opposition Members was the importance of small businesses to the economy. There has been a surprising increase in the number of jobs in the past couple of months. That reduction in unemployment was unexpected at this stage of an economic recovery. I suggest that it was largely created by small businesses, which are operating close to the optimum level of efficiency. They can therefore respond to growth quickly.

As small businesses respond to growth, they will be in danger of overtrading and their cash flow will come under severe pressure. That is why the Government's measure is welcome. It injects an extra £150 million into the cash flow of small businesses at a time when they need it. The backdating to 1 April will also be welcome because it will give companies the opportunity to plan from now with considerable security.

I am aware of the time and I know that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General wants to reply to the debate. I make one plea with all the force at my command. While the measures to improve cash flow are important, the one thing above all that the Treasury can do to help small businesses in the next year is to show a measure of forebearance to companies that are a little late in paying their VAT, national insurance or income tax. That lateness often does not happen because companies have mispriced their products or are running their businesses badly, but because they are having to wait for money from their customers. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to say that the Treasury understands that problem and will be reasonably sympathetic to companies that say that they need a little understanding to see them through until they are paid.

I commend the clause and I ask the Opposition not to press the amendment to a Division, because there is a difference between late payment and bad debt. Bad debt occurs much later than after three months. If we adopted the three-month waiting period, the VAT clawback would inevitably impose a regulatory burden. We need deregulation, not more regulation, and imposing a three-month limit instead of a six-month one would be bound to produce a regulatory nightmare. I look forward to hearing what my right hon. Friend says.

Sir John Cope: With the leave of the House, I shall respond briefly to the debate, which has been an interesting one and has ranged a good deal wider than the clause under consideration. It was none the worse for that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) echoed an important point that I used to emphasise when I was the Minister responsible for small firms—that running a small business is more difficult than running a large one simply because of the range of expertise that one must have and the number of different matters with which one must keep up. That is why it behoves those of us in government, with responsibility for the different bits of bureaucracy that impinge on small businesses, to ensure that we do our best to make sure that that bureaucracy is as user-friendly as possible. That applies as much to VAT as to any part of Government bureaucracy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) called for forebearance. Although Customs and Excise has been pursuing its proper duties in claiming revenue, my hon. Friend may be interested to know that the number of time-to-pay agreements has increased by 52 per cent. in the latest financial year for which figures are available, 1991-92. The value of those agreements has increased by 70 per cent. That demonstrates how debt management, the phrase now used by Customs and Excise, has responded to the needs of small business in the manner requested by my hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) made an interesting and even more wide-ranging speech than other hon. Members and referred to the commencement date. The new provision applies to a debt resulting from goods supplied in the previous year. If a firm has not been paid for something supplied on 30 June last year, under the old system it would not have been able to write off that payment for VAT purposes as a bad debt because 12 months had not elapsed. It will now be able to do so and could have done as soon as the new scheme started on 1 April.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) gave us the advantage of her expertise and gave us some shrewd advice for which, before she became a Member, we would have had to pay and, as she made clear, paid promptly. Even if we had got a discount from her husband, it was not clear that we would have done from my hon. Friend, for reasons that my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth made clearer than most.

The hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) raised a number of points about the cash accounting scheme. The consultation document states that the aim is "to make Cash Accounting as attractive and simple to use as possible."

In other words, it will be user-friendly, as I said earlier.

On that subject, the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) said that the conditions of entry to the cash accounting scheme should not be too restrictive. He seems to have gone back to Hartlepool or somewhere; at any rate, he is not here now. I tried to make it clear in my opening remarks that we had made it a lot easier to enter the cash accounting scheme. One need no longer fill in a form and seek permission in advance. Only two restrictions remain: the person concerned must not have committed a VAT offence in the past three years and must not have a debt to the Customs of more than £5,000 at the time. Those are very small restrictions on entry to the scheme.

As a past member of the Deputy Chief Whips' society or union, I must not run over my time tonight. I just want to emphasise, in concluding, that this is not the only thing that we are doing for small business in the Finance Bill. There is a range of help for small businesses and quite properly so, as the debate has emphasised, as regards rates, VAT penalties, capital gains tax relief for entrepreneurs, improvements to the loan guarantee scheme as called for by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts), reduced premiums for the loan guarantee scheme, expansion of the business start-up scheme and various deregulation measures.

All these are extremely desirable and I thoroughly recommend them and clause 48 to the Committee, but I do not recommend that the Committee votes for amendment No. 41.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Sydney Chapman and Mr. Andrew Mitchell.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 48 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Committee report progress.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

To sit again tomorrow.

Fishing (Time at Sea)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): We now come to the motion on sea fish licensing.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. According to the Order Paper,

"The Instrument has not yet been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments."

The Standing Orders place a duty on that Committee to report to the House. I must register a strong protest that the instrument is being rushed through and that the Committee's report is not available. The Committee is asking the Ministry a number of questions; according to the terms of our operation, we must allow it to reply to those questions, and we cannot do that until next week. I wrote to the Leader of the House asking him to defer the debate in view of the circumstances, but that has not been done.

I should add that the Ministry presented the order in time for it to be submitted to the Joint Committee, but for some reason deliberately delayed its submission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has put his point. He will know, however, that the Chair is not responsible for what the House debates.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope that it is a new point of order.

Mr. Wallace: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you will know only too well, as the statutory instrument is subject to the negative procedure, you will be obliged to put the Question at 11.30 pm. I am sure, however, that you are also aware that under Standing Order No. 15(2) you can

"interrupt the business and the debate shall stand adjourned till the next sitting" owing either to the "lateness of the hour" or the "importance of the subject matter".

The Division on an amendment to the Finance Bill has already eaten into the time allowed for this debate. Moreover, this is a complex provision that will affect the livelihood of fishermen around our coast——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman seems to be taking precedence over others who wish to speak. We have well over an hour for the debate.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Further to the point of order raised by my hon Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask you——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I ruled very fairly on the point raised by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer).

Mr. Bennett: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You do not have the power to decide what is debated, but you have the power to deprecate the procedure of a Department that does not give the House adequate time to debate the issues involved in Committee. It would be helpful if the Chair were to indicate that it disapproves strongly of a Department trying to short-circuit the work of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I ruled that the Chair had no responsibility for what the House debates.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Sea Fish Licensing (Time at Sea) (Principles) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1196), dated 30th April 1993, a copy of which was laid before this House on 4th May, be annulled.

My hon. Friends have a legitimate point. The way the order has been rushed before the House is unsatisfactory.

I should make it clear at the outset that the House has before it probably the most controversial fishing measure ever to be debated here. Certainly no policy has ever provoked such united opposition from our fishing communities. Everyone who reads the fishing press and, indeed, newspapers generally must be aware that relations between the Government and the fishing industry are at an all-time low. The Government's tie-up policy is the most important factor provoking such strenuous opposition from our fishermen. As an Opposition, we support the complete resistance of the fishermen to the compulsory tie-up policy.

If a conservation measure is to be effective, it has to be implemented with the co-operation of the industry. There is no way this policy will achieve the co-operation of the industry or will prove to be an effective fish conservation measure. That is the first reason why the Government should abandon their policy.

Hon. Members who have taken the trouble to read the order will be forced to conclude that we are being asked to implement a bureaucratic nightmare. In order to fish legally, a fishing vessel has to have a licence. If the order is passed, each licence will stipulate the number of half days which a fishing boat will be allowed to spend at sea. That number will be based on the number of days the vessel spent at sea in 1991. Of course, no fisherman knew in 1991 that the number of days spent at sea would determine how many days he could spend at sea in the future and would become a condition of his licence to fish in our waters.

Many fishermen filled in log books and can document to some extent the number of days spent at sea in 1991, but many cannot. Many did not have to fill in EC log books. For example, fishermen fishing species for which there are no national quotas did not have to provide evidence or complete log books. For many of them, there is no documentary evidence on which to base the number of days which they will be allowed to spend at sea in future. That is acknowledged in paragraph 7 of the order, which is entitled "Time spent fishing under the authority of a licence but not covered by written returns".

When we study that, we find that there is no evidence to be taken into account in some instances. It will be a purely arbitrary decision.

If we read the order further, we see a reference to "Exceptional circumstances". Of course there are exceptional circumstances. If we read through the list, it brings out how unworkable the order will be. I quote one example of exceptional circumstances:

"other factors leading to prolonged or repeated absence from work on the part of the master or any member of the crew of the vessel."

Let us be clear about it. Fishermen are like the rest of us. Some are more honest than others or, should I say, some are more economical with the truth. Harsh decisions will be taken. Clearly, it is intended that if the order is to bite, it has to be restrictive. That means that many fishermen will be treated unfairly in relation to the number of days on which they will be allowed to fish. It is unworkable and unfair.

In the limited time available to me—many hon. Members wish to take part in this very short debate—I shall confine myself to a few questions. Why has the minimum allocation been fixed at 160 days? There must be some basis for that figure—[Interruption.] It is not an EC figure. Indeed, there is a quite different EC figure applying to decommissioning, which is 200 half days, representing 100 full days on which one must fish to be eligible for the EC decommissioning scheme.

I ask for a rough guide, so my question is reasonable. What will be the average number of days at sea for each licence? The minimum, as I said, will be 160, although the maximum, especially in circumstances in which there are two crews, could be higher than 330 days. The fishing industry is entitled to an indication of the average number of days-at-sea allowed under the proposals.

I urge the Minister to give an important undertaking about the application of the regime. Will he undertake that the days-at-sea restrictions will never prevent British fishermen from fulfilling their quotas? In other words, may we be assured that no fisherman will be denied the opportunity to exhaust his national quota as a consequence of the days at sea restrictions?

The fishing industry has for years campaigned for a decommissioning scheme. In those campaigns it has had the support of the Labour party and hon. Members on both sides of the House, including some Conservative Members who represent fishing communities. Over the years, however, the Conservative Government have consistently refused to introduce a decommissioning scheme.

I am glad to see the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in his place. In 1990, he said:

"I emphasise that decommissioning is not the way to reduce the pressure on fish stocks".—[Official Report, 13 December 1990; Vol. 182, c. 1171].

Various versions of that statement have been repeated by Ministers in one debate after another. The Government have belatedly introduced what we would describe as a totally inadequate decommissioning scheme. The Select Committee on the European Communities in another place produced a valuable report nearly a year ago describing that scheme as too little, too late.

As a result of an amendment introduced during its passage, the parent legislation to the instrument that we are debating, the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992, states that, before considering what action to take,

"Ministers shall first give due consideration to a scheme of decommissioning in order to achieve a significant reduction in the capacity of the fishing fleet."

The Government's miserable decommissioning scheme was announced in February 1992. The Sea Fish (Conservation) Act received Royal Assent in December 1992. What consideration did the Government give to introducing an effective decommissioning scheme before the order now before the House was introduced? Where is the evidence that they gave the matter such consideration? Will their half-hearted decommissioning scheme, as we term it, achieve a reduction in fishing capacity? That, too, was challenged in the Select Committee report in another place.

Opposition Members are not against just this compulsory tie-up regime. We are against compulsory tie-up as a general proposition. We are against it because it is unfair. Many young skippers have borrowed large sums of money to buy vessels. How can it be right to force them, by such restrictions, into a situation in which they will not be able to earn enough money to make the loan repayments and cover their costs? Compulsory tie-up is economic nonsense. It inherently forces up fishing costs, so it cannot make sense as a long-term policy.

Compulsory tie-up threatens the safety of our fishermen. If a fisherman is fishing on the high seas and the weather suddenly deteriorates, he will go home, knowing that he can go out and fish again the next day. Once this scheme is in operation, however, and fishermen are out in adverse conditions, they will remember that they are only allowed to fish for so many days a year: they may not be able to return the next day. They will therefore try to catch as many fish as possible while they can. It is surely reasonable to argue that this will happen sometimes, so it is also reasonable to say that the regime will put our fishermen's lives at risk.

As anyone who knows the industry will confirm, the very possibility of the scheme coming into operation has led to boats cutting their crew members. Anyone who knows anything about fishing vessels knows that vessels with fewer crew members are not so safe as boats with full crews aboard. On safety grounds alone, therefore, the scheme is wrong.

We have a common fisheries policy, but compulsory tie-up will not apply to French or Spanish fishermen. What chance, then, of the scheme being acceptable to our fishermen when, for historical reasons, they find themselves competing against French, Irish and Spanish fishermen in the seas around this country? It is difficult for them to understand how that can be right under a common fisheries policy.

Conservation can work only if it has the support of the industry. Compulsory tie-up is unworkable. That is why the policy should be stopped in its tracks. The House can do that tonight, so I urge all hon. Members to join the Opposition in the Lobbies to vote down the order.

10.32 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): It is, I think, a matter of agreement that there is a crisis in the fish stocks. We know why. It is because fishermen are hunting a common resource, because there is no entry fee to that resource, because they hunt it competitively, and because, all the time, increased killing power is being brought in by new technology. One has only to look at Fishing News to see advertisements such as "Now fish can't hide"—because of the sheer weight of the technology deployed in the hunt for them.

The technology is improving all the time, and that has led to a crisis in the stocks. It is a worldwide, not just a European, crisis. The House will know that the Newfoundland cod fishery has been halted for two years because of the crisis in the cod stocks there. The Icelanders have cut their quotas radically because of the crisis in the cod stocks. Ten years ago we pulled about 540,000 tonnes of cod from the Baltic; that quota is now down to 40,000 tonnes.

The crisis in the North sea is equally grave. The purpose of these measures is to protect our fish, by our means, for our fishermen. Even if there were no such thing as a common fisheries policy, even if we had a national 200-mile limit, I would still be here today defending measures to protect British fish. That is the reason for the order. It is not here because it was imposed by Brussels. It is certainly not a case of waiting until the stocks are utterly depleted just because others might not take the same action. We are introducing the measure because our stocks are threatened, and we have a duty to save them.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): The Minister has a difficult job, but how can he make global statements about the intensity of the fishing effort in the light of the fact that, until recently, the Government were giving grants in order to intensify the fishing effort? Why, throughout a debate that has now lasted for several years around the Bellwin scheme and related measures, has there been no movement at all towards recognising and supporting low-intensity fishing regimes which apply in certain parts of the country through a regional fishing policy?

The Minister talks about a national fishing policy and declaims against high-intensity fishing, but people with conservation-conscious fishing regimes get no local protection and support against such high intensity fishery regimes. If the hon. Gentleman moved towards a regional fishing policy, what he has just said would have more credibility.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman raises a point of genuine debate. One could look at fisheries in regional terms, but some in the United Kingdom fish all round the coast and others are regional. There will always be some conflict between them. There is no such thing as a fishing industry in Britain: there are half a dozen fishing industries. One of the problems facing any Fisheries Minister is to try to reconcile the competing claims of the elements of the industry. I recognise that there are difficult choices to be made. It is my job to stand here and defend the one that we have made.

Everywhere, Governments are struggling to find an answer to conservation. That is why they have been forced to intervene in an industry which is traditionally unregulated, fragmented and individual. We have to consider how to achieve conservation. It could partly be done by telling the industry to depend on self-discipline and self-regulation. That would be an easy solution—it would certainly be more convenient for Ministers—but it does not always work.

The industry is competitive. The producer organisations are not always willing to exercise a discipline over their members that would be helpful. There is a history of evasion. I do not wish to labour the point, but all of us know that that exists. Because fish are a common resource, not a property right, fishermen who act with restraint tend to lose out to those who do not act with restraint.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a history of evasion on the French side of the English channel as well, and that it is particularly important for fishermen such as those who operate out of the port of Shoreham and in the English channel, that the British Government keep a close eye on what is going on in the French ports and ensure that French and other fishermen are not evading the rules while our fishermen are obeying them?

Mr. Curry: I totally agree with my hon. Friend. That is why the first meeting between the new French Minister and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and myself was about fisheries. I do not wish to draw up a league table of comparative sin and virtue in the fishing industry, but I recognise clearly that fishermen across the world tend to be a breed; that is why Governments fact similar problems whether in Guinea-Bissau or the west coast of Scotland.

There are various ways of going about conservation. There is self-discipline and technical conservation. But we know that there is no single measure that will do the trick, because of the different ways in which stocks behave. We know that what would be necessary if we were to achieve all our objectives by technical conservation might well be further than the industry would be prepared to go.

We know also that the industry tends to be divided in its reponse to challenges. For example, we are consulting at the moment on whether we should ban the landing of small ungutted rounders—the basic white fish stocks. I need not be a prophet to forecast that we are unlikely to have a favourable response to that from all the different parts of the United Kingdom, although I can see the argument in favour of taking that particular measure.

We have set up a forum with the industry. It has had its first meeting. It has gone into working groups, and we hope to find concrete measures of technical conservation acceptable to everybody. We are willing to commit research money to doing work that might reveal how we can go forward with the industry.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose——

Mr. Curry: The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said that many hon. Members wish to speak, and if I give way constantly, it will mop up the entire debate. As the House knows, I usually give way, but in these circumstances of a narrow debate I shall be rather more disciplined.

There is a buy-out. If one goes for a buy-out, one only buys time, because the technology is galloping along behind all the time. Countries with a long history of decommissioning have found that they still need to make further reductions. Decommissioning by itself simply has not delivered the trick. One has to do a lot of decommissioning before one starts cutting into the efficient catches. One tends to catch those who are committing the least attack on the stock. However, we believe that decommissioning has a role. We have accepted that it must form part of the package; that is why £25 million is available for decommissioning.

The order is only part of a package of measures. Days at sea will go back to back with decommissioning to make decommissioning into an effective conservation measure.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Has there been a change in recent years from the position that I remember so well? Every year, when the scientists made their recommendations about stocks, total allowable catches and quotas, the fishermen's lobbies, of which the British was not the least, came to all Ministers in the Council and pleaded for the TACs and quotas to be far higher than the scientists had recommended. Because of the power of that lobby, Ministers often agreed TACs and quotas at a level higher than they felt was prudent.

Is it not fair to say that, as a result of that pressure and those decisions, the crisis that now confronts the industry is partly due to Ministers over the years and partly due to the irresponsible pressure of fishermen who would not face the crisis in years gone by and who now face a far bigger crisis?

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend makes a valid point. It has been the case that Ministers have succumbed to pressures in the past. They have been willing to edge up the TACs and the quotas to meet certain political pressures on them. That is one of the reasons why we have the crisis now. That option is no longer available to us.

The important point about the scheme is that it is a minimal scheme. It will come into operation in September or October. We want to issue the provisional allocations which will then give rise to the definitive allocations. The scheme will not come into force until September or October. It will then stand still until we are satisfied that other member states are fulfilling their obligations to reduce capacity. I emphasise this point. I do not have the slightest intention—the House would not permit me in any case—of inviting the House to take further measures unless it is clear that our Community partners are also taking measures to meet their targets. I have emphasised that from the beginning.

The position is well summed up in a newspaper from which I do not normally quote, and which does not normally mention me with great favour. The editorial in this week's Fishing News says:

"More money for decommissioning, much as the industry calls for it, is simply a political non-starter in the current climate."

It then states why there is no chance of getting more money for it. The editorial continues:

"On technical measures, again the Government is lukewarm. A major difficulty is the enforcement. The Government knows that fishermen are up to all the tricks in avoiding the impact of technical measures and hence have no faith in them as conservation measures. One reason why technical measures fail is that they are invariably imposed against the advice of the industry which then immediately sets about side-stepping them. The reason they are so often imposed is that fishermen cannot agree on what measures are required."

The editorial points out that a new federation has been formed in the north-east of England which may reflect certain disagreements with the national federation.

The editorial then points out, as the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) mentioned, the possibility of considering a regional fisheries policy. It concludes:

"If the industry is to fight tie-ups effectively and convincingly, it must have a realistic alternative. So far the alternatives put forward do not recognise the political realities and the complexities of fisheries management or the fragmentation and diversity of the industry."

That is the view of the industry's own house magazine.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): As a Conservative Member whose understanding of such matter is limited, I wonder whether the Minister could explain something to me. Am I right in thinking that the arrangements that he is announcing tonight will peg the 1993 quota at the 1991 days-at-sea level? Secondly—and more important—is he saying that he will not introduce any new resolution, as he said on 14 July 1992,

"unless we are satisfied that member states which share our fishery stocks are taking effective steps to meet their multi-annual guidance programme targets."—[Official Report, 14 July 1992; Vol. 211, c. 1027.]?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. We have already had three interventions, all of them lengthy. We have a very limited time for the debate, and a number of hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye. Long interventions do not help.

Mr. Curry: I can confirm to my hon. Friend that the promises that we gave during the passage of the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act are all being fulfilled. This measure represents a standstill on effort expressed in days at sea based on the 1991 figure. I shall explain what "based" means in a minute. We will not move from that position, and I will not invite the House to tighten that restriction until we are satisfied that other member states are meeting their own targets, set in the EC consultative group. I am delivering on that promise in precise terms.

The Government have a package of measures, including licensing under 10 m, the decommissioning scheme—using which we have to remove 55 per cent. of the target—and days at sea. As I said, it is minimal. We will also reintroduce grants for vessel safety equipment—for fitting radio beacons, for life rafts, for hand-held radios, flares and rockets.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) mentioned safety. Let me say to him very seriously that, this year, where there have been no restrictions in fishing, we have already seen a significant loss of life in the fisheries industry. A couple of weeks ago I was in Northern Ireland, where two lives were lost in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor). That happens even when there are no restrictions. Fishing is a hazardous business; there is loss of life in the fishery.

I shall not draw comparisons in respect of lives lost from one year to another, but I do not seriously believe that the present measure will tempt fishermen to risk their lives. I simply do not think that that is the case, and I hope that nobody will blame on this measure every single loss of life that occurs in the fishing industry. That would not be an intellectually honest thing to do.

What will happen now is as follows. The principles order clears the way to send forward the traditional allocations, based on 1991 figures, so that we can make up allocations for people who have been caught by exceptional circumstances in 1991. There will then be a period for informal representations, so that we may be informed of the adjustments that are necessary—for example, for the non-fishing effort.

I have received many representations in respect of boats that do oil rig work or white weeding in the Thames estuary, as well as those engaged in tourist activity and fishing for salmon and migratory trout. We have listened to those representations and will make allowance for such activities. We have also received representations concerning those areas where the data is not complete.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): In reiterating those assurances, which are most helpful, will my hon. Friend confirm that there will be no change whatever with regard to boats under 10 m? While he is collecting information, can he assure the House that he has no plans, as far ahead as one can see, to apply the days-at-sea restrictions to the very large fleet of boats under 10 m?

Mr. Curry: We have of course completed the licensing of the fleet of boats under 10 m, and we will not introduce days-at-sea restrictions during the lifespan of the current multi-annual guidance programme target. Within that lifespan, we shall be able to review all our conservation measures, so I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that he seeks.

After the fishermen have had a month in which to make their representations, we will analyse those representations over two or three months, and then the full statutory instrument tribunal will be available.

The House will want to know that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, together with the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland will be appointing Sir Michael Ogden QC as president of the Sea Fish Licence Tribunal. Sir Michael will commence work immediately on a part-time basis to assist us in finalising the arrangements for the tribunal's work and will then preside over its operation later in the year.

He has a great wealth of experience on which to draw, including 13 years as chairman of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, acting as the assessor of compensation for miscarriages of justice for the Home Secretary and the Minister of Defence, and sitting as deputy High Court judge in the Queen's bench division in addition to his practice as Queen's counsel. I am confident that he will ensure that fishermen who wish to appeal will receive open, fair and impartial treatment. At the same time, I pay tribute to Judge Michael Coulson for his preliminary work in setting up the tribunal and pending the appointment of the tribunal.

We expect the allocations to operate from early September or October, and the days at sea will not be conterminous with the quota year. That will introduce an additional element of flexibility into the scheme. We have sought to have a flexible, effective and enforceable scheme. All the time spent at sea in 1991 will be counted. We will make an allowance for exceptional circumstances such as a breakdown or family bereavement, and will calculate in half days to permit flexibility to the fisherman. There will be the de minimis allocation. There will be allowances for vessels that are caught by the eight-day tie-up. I have observed the representations that I received on that matter.

We will go no further than this order unless we are satisfied that we are getting effective action from our partners. We will differentiate between sector and stock in deciding how to take the system forward in the circumstances that I have outlined—when our partners are moving forward and we have received from the House and another place the affirmative resolution that we have written into the rules.

The measure will be of practical benefit, because it gives well-defined quantity entitlements to fishermen. It can be targeted by a fishing area and method of fishing, and it is enforceable. It will give an economic benefit by curbing the race to fish and the simultaneous landings than can glut the market and help profitability when the stocks recover and the catch rates increase. It can provide the basis for rationalisation without increasing the exploitation rate.

The measure will be of conservation benefit, because it is essential for decommissioning to be effective. It will be a method of combating black fish landings and discarding when quotas have been exhausted. It will limit the exploitation of vulnerable non-quota fish. I must emphasis that all stocks around the United Kingdom are vulnerable —some are in grave crises. The case for the freeze on effort is absolutely open and shut for all the stocks around the United Kingdom.

The measure is for conversation and the future of the industry. Neither the Labour party nor the industry has offered us an effective alternative. The measure is a British method, devised with the British industry in view to preserve British stocks for British fishermen and carried through by the British Government. It is for the long-term future of the industry, and I urge the House to reject the Labour party's plea to reject it.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The measure is an abomination, which should not have been proposed to the House in the first place. We should have had a decommissioning scheme four or five years ago, when Labour Members were asking for it, to tackle the problem of conservation directly. The Government will spend a massive amount on this order—the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations has estimated about £8 million. That could be the kernel for a much bigger decommissioning which could be used more effectively and directly.

The Minister has approached the problems of fishing in an authoritarian way to conceal the consequences of his failure to introduce a decommissioning scheme years ago. Most consequences will be imposed on a fishing industry that will be driven into bankruptcy by having the days at sea limited in this way. I do not want the Minister to get away with the sort of salami tactics that he has adopted tonight, saying that it will be done bit by bit, with more proposals to come later. That is salami-ism.

When the Minister has such powers, they will be implemented. The days at sea will be gradually reduced in the same way as the total allowable catch was reduced, although the Minister told us that total allowable catches were an effective means of conservation. Once he has the powers, it follows automatically that the days at sea will be limited.

We are being asked to sign a blank cheque for a Minister who has demonstrated that he will not listen to the fishing industry. He is using an economically inefficient method of approaching the problems of the industry. It will result in huge sums of capital being tied up for days every year. The order will not be paralleled by European measures.

The Minister said that if the EC did not achieve multi-annual guidance programmes the Government would reconsider. Of course it will achieve them. It is because we are so far behind in ours that he is having to introduce this panic measure now. That is the problem. Will the Minister say that he will not implement the measure until similar measures and the same sort of limitations on days at sea are imposed on our continental competitors? If such limitations are not imposed on our competitors, what kind of spectacle will it be when our fishing boats are tied up in port and our fishermen watch the fish being caught by French, Dutch and Danish fishermen?

Our fish are caught none the less. The conservation damage is caused none the less. The fish are caught in French, Dutch and Danish nets. They will simply not be caught by British fishermen, to be landed on the British market for the British industry. That is all that the Minister will achieve. He will give a bonanza to the Europeans, who are effectively uncontrolled because policing at their ports is not so strong, effective or clear-cut as in Britain. Can the Minister tell us that the fish that are not caught by our industry and are caught by our competitors will be effectively controlled at the port of landing? Of course he cannot. The Spanish will have a bonanza thanks to the order. The fish will die none the less.

Limiting days at sea is a wrong approach to the problems of the industry and it will bankrupt large swathes of it. The far more effective approach that the Minister should take is to consult the industry and work with it to impose conservation measures by selective gear—by increasing mesh sizes, using square mesh panels and implementing all the measures that the fishermen have proposed over the years.

Mr. Curry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: The Minister did not give way to me, so I shall not give way to him: I am sorry.

Only selective measures can achieve proper and effective conservation. The crude measure that the Government have introduced cannot do so. It will simply drive fishermen, when they are allowed to put to sea, to catch as much as they possibly can of everything they possibly can. That is the inevitable consequence of the measure.

Having obtained the powers, the Minister should consult the industry so that proper and effective conservation can be achieved. He should work out a joint approach with the industry. That is the only way to do it. The Minister is going in for a Ceausescu approach to the problems in the fishing industry.

There is a problem with the vessels that have caught non-pressure stocks and, therefore, have not been required to keep records. Some allowance has to be made for such vessels. The only way to do so is to give them a notional allowance. They cannot be asked to develop records that do not exist.

The Grimsby fishing industry fishes by passive fishing with large mesh sizes of more than 110 mm. It is conservation conscious. It is a conservation-effective industry. When the Minister comes to exercise discretion —as he will, because at some stage he will have to discriminate—he should advance the claims of those sections of the fishing industry that are the most conservation conscious and conservation efficient.

I make a plea to the Minister. The measure came before the spirit of the Newbury noes. It is the sort of authoritarian measure that the Prime Minister has told us, having heard the voice of the people, the Government will avoid. They will consult and work with people. They will not be authoritarian. They will not impose their wishes on the people any more. Why does not the Minister join in that process in dealing with the fishing industry? I give the assurance that, if he does not, the fishing industry will be sour, intractable and unco-operative and there will be enormous difficulty in implementing the measure.

The order will require massive bureaucracy. It will require much extra spending that would not be necessary if conservation were achieved with the co-operation of the industry. That is my plea to the Minister. He has the powers. He should hold off and co-operate with the industry to get a better deal.

I also make a plea to Conservative Members from fishing ports. There is an enormous weight of responsibility on their shoulders. There are not many Members of Parliament from fishing constituencies. Fishing is a beleaguered industry. Conservative Members would not do this to any other section of the communities that they represent. Those Members would not require pubs, banks or shops to close three or four days a week. They would not dare to do that. Why do that to the fishing industry? Why do they treat the industry in that fashion? The industry does not have many people to speak for it and those Members should have the guts to speak for it tonight.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I do not know why the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) pointed at me in particular as he concluded his speech, because my opposition to the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992 and to the order is well known and recognised.

I do not record my opposition to the Act in a boastful spirit, but with great sadness. I agreed wholeheartedly with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang) and I also agreed with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, although he was far too emotional about the subject.

When the Act was passed, I had hoped that the relevant orders, of which this is the first, would not be introduced to implement the powers under it. I had hoped for a response from my hon. Friend the Minister and from the industry so that we could avoid implementation of the restrictions on days at sea through the imposition of a compulsory tie-up. I honestly do not believe that the orders and the Act represent the right way in which to achieve conservation. If I thought that they would work, I would join my hon. Friend the Minister in the Lobby. I do not believe that they represent the right approach. [Interruption.] I ask Opposition Members to be quiet, please. This is a serious matter and they are not helping the fishing industry.

The need for conservation is beyond doubt. My hon. Friend the Minister is right about that and the industry also acknowledges it. If I am critical of my hon. Friend the Minister—I believe that he has been treated unfairly in this business and that a lot of unnecessary blame has been put on him—I am also disappointed that that industry has not responded with counter-proposals to the tie-up.

When the fishermen held a large rally in Westminster Hall in July, I was greeted with fairly cheap applause, because I had done that popular thing by opposing the then Sea Fish (Conservation) Bill. I said to those fishermen that they should not applaud me because their industry not only had to oppose the Bill but produce counter-proposals. It is a source of great sadness to me that it has not done that with a united voice.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Yes, it has.

Mr. Harris: My good friend from Scotland says that it has. I accept that that is true of certain areas and I pay tribute to the leaders of the fishing industry in the south-west, who have produce alternatives, at least tentatively, to solve this difficult subject. They have suggested closed areas in which no fishing should take place in spawning seasons. That is eminently sensible. I also agreed with their suggested technical measures.

The industry, unfortunately, has not spoken with one voice and that is why, over the years, it has done itself a great disservice. The lack of unity has been apparent on many issues apart from conservation. I realise that there are as many different views about fishing as there are fishermen in any port, but the industry must get together, particularly in the light of what the Government are imposing tonight.

If the industry produced viable proposals and if my hon. Friend the Minister and the Government were prepared to listen, we could develop a better means of conserving fish than that proposed.

I welcome the setting up of the conservation forum. I agree that it will not be easy to get agreement in it, but I again echo what was said by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby—we really must try, even at this late hour, to secure agreement on other ways of approaching conservation.

In commending the order, my hon. Friend the Minister said that its objective was to protect our fish by our means for our fishermen. The difficulty, particularly in an area like area 7, the south-west, is with the last bit of that objective, "for our fishermen". In area 7, for the most important species, we have in some cases only 12 per cent. of the total allowable catch and the rest belongs, in quota terms, to the boats of other member states. If our fishermen are prevented from fishing to the full, others will go on fishing and fish will not be conserved.

My hon. Friend the Minister is going to get up and I will certainly give way to him. I pay tribute to him because he has said that he will recognise these regional differences, and that is a very important point. I come back to a point made by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). We cannot impose a national system of control here. We need to approach the problem in a regional fashion. The situation in my part of the world is completely different from the situation in Scotland. We must therefore have regional flexibility. I know that my hon. Friend is working on that, and I think that he wants to intervene.

Mr. Curry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have no wish to take up his time. On the share of stocks in the south-west, I recognise that it is a different fishery from the fishery around the north-east coast, areas 4 and 6, where the stocks are the most vulnerable, but the 12 per cent. figure must be treated with some care. The United Kingdom's share is as follows: sole in the western channel, 59 per cent.; sole in the Bristol channel, 28 per cent.; plaice in the English channel, 29 per cent.; nephrops in area 7, 33 per cent.; and mackerel in the western area, 56 per cent. Boats in the south-west catch much higher-value species than do those fishing off most of the coasts.

Mr. Harris: I accept that, and my hon. Friend will note that I picked my words with some care and used the phrase "for the most important species". But the point has been made.

After dealing with the general point, I turn to some detailed criticisms of the order. The first point has already been made fairly by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East: how on earth we are to give days at sea to those people who have no track record through log books? That difficulty will cause enormous friction because to some extent the decision will be arbitrary.

There is also the cost of implementation. The Ministry has used a figure of £1·5 million a year, but I believe that the cost will be much higher than that given in the explanatory memorandum.

Then there is the biggest issue of all for me when it comes to unfairness—the wretched flag of convenience quota-hoppers. How on earth are we to impose days at sea restrictions on boats that come out of Corunna or Vigo? We cannot put those restrictions on them, and my hon. Friend and his officials know that. Therefore, I am not prepared, on that ground alone, to support a measure in which we agree that, although the quota-hoppers are covered, there is not yet a means of controlling them but in which we are going to impose restrictions on my fishermen from Newlyn and fishermen from other ports around Cornwall. For that reason alone, I could not, in all conscience, vote with my hon. Friend the Minister, although I have the greatest admiration for him.

I beg my hon. Friend just to think again on this matter. There is still time. I beg the industry to give up the protests, put them on one side and start serious talks with the Ministry so that at last we can find a sensible solution to what is undoubtedly a difficult and complex problem.

11.9 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) is right to say that there should be serious talks. However, for the talks ever to take place, the Government must show a willingness to retreat from the hard-line attitude that they have taken, with their claims that effort limitation is the only way that they will achieve the necessary targets. They know that effort limitation will do precious little for conservation. The Minister talked about discards. I challenge him to show me one paragraph in the order that will make the least difference to the number of discards that are going back into the sea.

The Liberal Democrats believe that the route that the Government have taken is an inefficient way to pursue conservation ends. It ties up the capital of business men for days in a way that would be unacceptable in any other industry. The people employed on vessels will be unemployed for those days, and we know of the difficulties that many have experienced when they have tried to draw unemployment benefit for those days.

The Government's route is also an inflexible way to pursue conservation objectives. The hon. Member for St. Ives spoke of the western approaches. My understanding is that although, a year to 18 months ago, there was a view that boats should be tied up 30 per cent. of the days to meet conservation ends, that has now been reduced to 8 per cent. There is no way that the order can take any account of those changes.

The Minister said that, when the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992 was being drawn up, the quota for haddock in the North sea was small. That quota has now gone up from 55,000 tonnes to 133,000 tonnes, but we still have an inflexible system. The Minister said that he would not wish to see quota uncaught because boats were obliged to stay in port. I hope that, when he answers, he will tell us where that promise is implemented in the orders. Having a calendar year for days-at-sea restrictions that differs from the one for quotas will lead to confusion rather than to the flexibility that the Minister claimed that he wants.

Furthermore, the situation facing the pelagic sector shows how ludicrous the order is. We are told that the sector will be affected by days-at-sea restrictions as well, but why? The Scottish Pelagic Fishermen's Association has sent to some hon. Members a letter that it recently received, dated 11 May, from the Sea Fish Industry Authority, which says:

"on the basis of the information to hand, it seems as though the Pelagic segment has already reduced capacity since 1.1.92 sufficiently to meet the MAGP requirements."

Why, in heaven's name, is that sector having restrictions imposed on it when it has met multi-annual guidance programme requirements and when, on the evidence of last year's figures, it was not able to catch all the herring and mackerel in the quota when it had no restrictions? How will it be able to do that when it does have restrictions? The Minister must answer that fundamental question.

I entirely endorse the opening remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East. He asked what was the logic of 160 half days. The Minister did not tell us. I suspect that it is a period that would not allow any boat to be viable if that were all the time that it was allowed to go out. However, there will be a number of add-ons.

The Minister reaffirmed his commitment that there will be no order to reduce the number of days agreed for 1993 unless there is clear evidence that other countries are effectively implementing their MAGP targets as well. While our fishermen are restricted, it does not matter that other European countries are not effectively pursuing their MAGP targets, so while our fishermen are tied up, the fishermen of other EC states—Spain, France and Denmark—will be able to carry on fishing. Just because the Minister says that he will not bring in anything more restrictive, that does not hide the fact that there is no way in which our boats can increase the number of days when they can go to sea.

We shall have fixed and rigid restrictions which will mean the opposite of conservation for those who have relatively few days at sea. Those who in 1991 were running double crews and were at sea all the time will benefit, whereas the Clyde fishermen who tie up over the weekends will lose out. The boats with fewer days at sea will find that the monetary value of their licences will be devalued.

When the Bill was passed in the other place, their Lordships insisted that the order could not be introduced until the Government had given due consideration to the contribution of decommissioning in promoting conservation. The Government believe that a few words in the preamble to the order represent a magic incantation which will get around the statutory hurdle. The Minister has a duty to tell the House what consideration the Government gave to decommissioning.

Given the feelings in the industry, it is inevitable that someone will take the decision to judicial review. Following the decision in the House of Lords in the case of Pepper v. Hart that proceedings in the House can be used in evidence, the Minister should tell us what consideration was given to decommissioning.

The hon. Member for St. Ives highlighted the fact that it will be difficult to control foreign vessels or those flying flags of convenience coming out of other ports. They are getting a bonus from the orders as they are getting 1988 as their base year; they are having their cake and eating it and the Government have not explained why.

There has been no explanation of whether oral evidence will be acceptable in the absence of written documentation. We believe that it should be and we hope that when regulations on the sea fish tribunals are introduced, it will be made perfectly clear that oral evidence will be acceptable.

What will we be saying that our fishermen should have been doing? The scheme envisages that British fishermen are a race apart, and in a sense they are, but they will need a practising lawyer on board to decipher some aspects of the order. In 1991, they needed to be fortune tellers to know that what they had to keep then would apply to them in 1993, and they will have to be the most brilliant businessmen to squeeze enough out of 160 half days a year to remain commercially viable.

The order is no way to approach fisheries conservation. The industry has called year after year for decommissioning. It has been supported by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. The fact that for years the Government were deaf to their calls means that the industry is now being lumbered with a most inflexible and inefficient method of conservation which I believe will sour relationships between the Government and industry when what is needed is constructive dialogue.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Hon. Members have mentioned the recent tragedy in Northern Ireland. I salute the memory of those two young men, one of whom was my constituent from Bushmills in County Antrim. He was a young man who wanted to fish from his earliest days. He went straight from school into a Government training scheme and for the seven years of his working life was engaged in fishing. He met with a tragic freak wave which swept him and his companion to their deaths.

The fishermen of Northern Ireland and their federation have stated that if the order is passed it will increase tragedies among fishermen by requiring them to fish in adverse weather conditions as there will be times when the only days when fishermen are permitted to fish will be those when the weather is bad. We have enough problems in the fishing industry without sending men out in adverse conditions.

The order will cause widespread unemployment among fishermen and the fish processing industry. It will also disadvantage British fishermen. I cannot accept the Minister's argument that he is preserving British fish; he is preserving British fish for other European countries to fish them. The Minister's argument strikes me as very preverse.

The order will introduce an unjust system, forcing our fishermen to fish in bad weather at a time when United Kingdom fishermen must comply rigidly with the quotas —far more rigidly than any other EC fishing nation. It is no use the Minister talking to the French ambassador; French fishermen will continue to fish in our waters while our boats are tied up. The Minister should withdraw the order and ensure that it is not introduced until all EC countries submit to the same rules. He should tell those countries that they would not have a common fisheries industry without our waters; the British waters made that industry. The money to be spent on civil servants to operate the scheme should be transferred to the decommissioning scheme.

If we introduce conservation in the way suggested by the order, our fishing industry will have a sad future. The fishermen of Northern Ireland are totally opposed to the order.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): It is a great shame that there has been so little time for this important debate, in which many hon. Members wanted to speak. Even after tonight, the issue will not go away; it has already been debated for a long time.

The Opposition cannot support the order, for reasons given by hon. Members on both sides of both Houses. It is both bureaucratic and expensive. Will the Government provide financial help for the many fishermen who will have to appeal against it? Will they note rulings made in the European Court about similar measures relating to allocation of days at sea for those who have no track records? The measure will not necessarily meet conservation objectives; it will discriminate against fishermen who have put less pressure on fish stocks, while rewarding those who have done the opposite. As has already been said, it has implications for crewing and safety, and it is not supported by any section of the industry.

The decommissioning element is grossly inadequate, amounting to £25 million over three years. The French fleet was given that much in a single year. There is also the issue of complying with assurances given during the passage of the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992. Under new section (6D)—the Act amends an earlier 1967 Act—before considering the measure relating to days at sea,

"Ministers shall first give due consideration to a scheme of decommissioning in order to acheive a significant reduction in the capacity of the fishing fleet."

Where is that consideration? Where is the "significant reduction" in the fleet? A paltry £25 million goes nowhere near such an objective.

What about the Minister's assurance that there would be a level playing field between our fishing fleet and those of other European member states—an assurance that he gave the House on 14 July last year? While our fishermen face being tied up in port, their competitors are free to fish as widely as they wish.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morley: I am sorry; there is not enough time.

Because foreign fleets receive more generous funding, they are in a position to move into our fleets—to buy up British licences and expand their quota-hopping operations.

We believe that there is an alternative to this measure: working with the industry to introduce technical conservation measures, gear types, selectivity, and bans on industrial fishing. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) pointed out that fishermen themselves have suggested sensible measures, advocating retention lengths, minimum landing sizes and a ban on twin rigs. I believe that it is possible, by co-operating with the fishermen, to introduce measures that will work.

The measure is a marine set-aside without compensation. It is institutionalised bankruptcy for our fishing fleet. Many people have debts, having taken out loans to increase their capacity, supported by the very Government who are taking away the possibility for them to earn a decent living.

I urge all hon. Members to vote against the order. Let us reject it, not in a negative way but in a positive way to bring back to the House a decent measure which meets conservation objectives, which has the co-operation of all fishermen, which has the support of all sides of the House and which will meet the objects of a substainable fishing industry, which the order fails to do.

Mr. Salmond: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Feelings are running very high on this issue. Many hon. Members from fishing constituences have been unable to speak. Clearly the debate has not been extensive enough, given the importance of the issue. May I ask you to exercise your powers under Standing Order 15(2) and adjourn the debate to the next sitting day?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not prepared to exercise those powers.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Sir Hector Monro): I should say to the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) that the only way to bankrupt the fishing industry is to ensure that there are no fish. That is what is so sad about the debate. As one who has been involved in conservation legislation, both privatee Members' Bills and Government legislation, in the House over 20 years or more, I find it sad to hear Opposition Members bandying the word "conservation" about while not being prepared to put forward any scheme that will work.

If we are to maintain a sound fishing industry, it is essential that we conserve fish. On legislation dealing with livestock, we have always taken scientific advice. The scientific advice in the fishing world shows that our stocks are vulnerable and that we have to conserve them very carefully. We must accept that neither total allowable catches nor the quota can do the job alone, and that the methods in the order are the best way forward.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): My hon. Friend talks of conservation. In the Clyde, the fishermen took heed of that. They imposed their own weekend ban over a number of years. Now that means that they have not got days at sea recorded in 1991. Will my hon. Friend confirm that consideration will be given to that point and that he will take positive account of the days when they could have been at sea which were not recorded because of that self-imposed ban for conservation purposes?

Sir Hector Monro: The fishermen in the Clyde will be able to have the same fishing pattern as they did in 1991 but, as they have a statutory ban, which is an exceptional circumstance, we can consider it under paragraph 9(2)(d). We shall certainly consider it carefully under the special exception clause.

Mr. McGrady rose——

Sir Hector Monro: The main message that Opposition Members do not seem to appreciate is that there will not be a reduction in fishing effort; there will merely be a standstill on where we were in 1991. We would not reduce the amount of fishing effort without bringing forward an affirmative resolution. There is no possibility of a reduction in fishing effort taking place without further debate in the House.

Mr. McGrady rose——

Sir Hector Monro: I hope, too, that Opposition Members will appreciate the exceptional care and trouble that will be taken in reaching the days at sea arrangement. The Department will be writing too all licence holders, who will have time to respond to the details on the computer printout and subsequently have discussions with the Department before the number of days at sea on the licence is fixed. Subsequent to that, they will have a right of appeal to the tribunal.

We had demonstrations last winter about running out of quota. The worst way to react now would be to have a free-for-all, with no check on fishing around our coast. We are putting forward a practical conservation package. It would be foolhardy to throw that out tonight. I hope that the House will support the order, in the interests of conservation.

CARDIFF BAY BARRAGE BILL

Motion made, and Question put,

That, at the sitting on Monday 17th May, the Speaker shall put the Question necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion moved by Mr James Arbuthnot on 2nd April relating to Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill not later than half-past Eleven o'clock or one and a half hours after the resumption of those proceedings, whichever is the earlier; and the said proceedings may continue after the expiry of the time for opposed business.—*[Mr. Robert G. Hon. Members: Object.

Co-operatives (European Community)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

11.43 pm

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): The importance attached by the British co-operative movement to a European co-operative statute is shown tonight by the presence of the co-operative parliamentary group, with the exception of one member, from the House of Commons. We have 14 members from this House and four members from the other place.

Our task in this debate is to ascertain the Government's attitude to a European statute and to persuade the Minister to say that the Government have no serious objections to a European legal framework for co-operatives and will ultimately support the approval of the statute in the Council of Ministers.

I hope that it will be helpful if I briefly set out the background to the creation of the European co-operative statute. In 1989, the European commission became aware of a potential problem in the Community for co-operatives wishing to enter cross-border trading under existing and future regulations. It was also anxious to ensure that co-operatives were aware of their eligibility for finance under the co-operative regional and social fund. The Commission stated:

"the question may therefore arise at Community level of harmonising certain national provisions in order to improve the conditions of access to European markets for mutual societies, co-operatives and similar enterprises."

For that reason, it was willing to consider whether a special statute should be set up for the co-operative and mutual sector

"which would facilitate grouping operations, in conditions similar to those available to public limited companies under the European company proposal."

In other words, to use last year's buzz phrase, it would create a level playing field within the single market.

The statute would allow the creation of a supra-national co-operative society by two or more existing national co-operative societies as long as each had its headquarters in a different member state and had a minimum of 1,000 ecu. The statute passed through the European Parliament on 22 January, but it still has to go through the Council of Ministers.

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his excellent speech. Is he aware that the Co-operative Insurance Society represents 14 per cent. of the total insurance market in Europe and that an astonishing 4 million people are represented by it?

Mr. Turner: I thank my hon. Friend for that comment. I am sure that the importance of co-operation in insurance is recognised, as my hon. Friend said.

Mr. Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston): Is my hon. Friend aware that there are 45,000 worker and producer co-operatives in the EC, which employ almost 750,000 people?

Mr. Turner: That information speaks for itself and, again, shows the importance of the co-operative sector in our economy.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Is my hon. Friend aware that there is a fund under the statute that allows for the development of co-operatives across Europe? Surely the Government would be in favour of that. It would be a fund similar to the Co-operative Development Agency over which the Government presided and to which they gave funds. We want diversity, choice and competition in our economy.

Mr. Turner: I am sure that the Minister has taken note of those comments which, again, show the importance of the co-operative system.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Will my hon. Friend press the Minister to ensure that the Government are aware of the innovative proposals in the statute that would allow European co-operatives to issue investors' shares and non-users' shares in addition to the traditional redeemable and transferable power value shares?

Mr. Turner: That is an important aspect of the recommendations in the statute.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): Is my hon. Friend aware that co-operative banks have a 17 per cent. share of the market in the EC and that our own, dear Co-operative bank has more than 1·5 million customers?

Mr. Turner: That speaks for itself. I hope that the Minister has taken note of that important fact.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to draw to the Minister's attention the importance and weight of the co-operative sector, which has been illustrated by several comments. Is it not of the greatest importance that the European co-operative statute would run parallel to the European companies statute? It will therefore create a level playing field between the co-operative and private sector of the economy, which is surely consistent with what we all seek within Europe and the United Kingdom. Will my hon. Friend invite the Minister to mention that aspect?

Mr. Turner: I will most definitely take the opportunity to invite the Minister to comment positively on that aspect in his speech.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way yet again—in the middle of his speech, I hope. May I remind him that there are no fewer than 15 million members of co-operatives in the European Community, owning no fewer than 16,000 shops with an annual turnover—this shows our European credentials—of about 25 billion ecu? Some 8 million of those members are in the United Kingdom, and they own 4,650 shops, 90 of which are super-stores. Will my hon. Friend respond?

Mr. Turner rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I hope that hon. Members will now act in a more dignified and serious way.

Mr. Turner: I hope that we are treating the matter in a serious and dignified way, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that that is what all my hon. Friends who are here to represent the co-operative movement are doing. The reason why we are taking the matter so seriously is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) has just said, we speak for 8 million consumers—8 million subscribing members of co-operatives who are looking forward to a new development that will extend co-operation across frontiers and enable our co-operatives to meet up with many more millions of co-operatives over in Europe.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): As my hon. Friend knows, I represent a rural constituency. I am sure that he will be aware that, in the common market, more than half the agricultural production is harvested and processed by co-operatives —indeed, the Co-operative Wholesale Society is the biggest farmer in the United Kingdom. Does my hon. Friend accept that we are talking not just about retail and banking activity but about agricultural production?

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments, which again explain how important it is that the co-operative statue is granted and that it becomes a reality.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that large numbers of people work in the co-operative retail sector? I understand that there are about 200,000 in the European Community as a whole and that some 81,000 of them work in retail co-operatives in this country.

Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), I do not represent a rural constituency. We have had a large number of problems in the co-operative movement in recent years, but, despite the recession and the economic problems faced by the whole retail sector, the retail side of the co-operative movement is still there. It is to be hoped that, over the next few years, under a Labour Government, it will be able to rebuild and re-establish itself as it should, not just in Britain but in co-operation with other co-operative retail societies and their equivalents in other European countries.

Mr. Turner: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments. With 81,000 employees in Great Britain, the co-operative movement is a very significant employer. It has a great responsibility in terms of employment—not just for those 81,000 jobs but for the many thousands of other jobs throughout the country which are linked to co-operative purchasing or which rely on co-operatives.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Govan): Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), I do not represent a rural constituency. I represent a shipbuilding constituency, which will remain a shipbuilding constituency, thanks to the co-operation and help of many of my colleagues. Is my hon. Friend aware that 31 per cent. of the food market in Denmark and about 8 per cent. in Great Britain is supplied by consumer co-operatives? We do not agree that those figures are admirable—they should be increased.

Mr. Turner: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. I hope that the Minister has taken note of that significant information, because it has a great bearing on the campaign that we are waging in co-operatives in the United Kingdom to become part of the wider co-operatives movement in Europe.

I hope that the powerful case that has been made by my colleagues from the co-operative parliamentary group has convinced the Minister of the fairness in creating a level playing field between co-operative and mutual businesses and private European companies in the single market. On behalf of all my colleagues in the co-operative parliamentary group and the wider co-operative movement, I sincerely hope that the Minister can support——

Mr. Sheerman: I shall comment on not only the content of my hon. Friend's speech but the serious and dignified way in which he delivered it. This Adjournment debate has been used probably in a better humoured and more informed way than most Adjournment debates—it gives credit to the Adjournment debate rather than anything else and I congratulate him on so using it.

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments.

In all our deliberations in the co-operative movement, I hope that we will approach these matters in a dignified and businesslike way, yet, at the same time, recognise the human side of the way in which our co-operative movement operates. We are about people—we put people first. I hope that the Government will recognise that in their consideration of our needs and that the Minister will support the case that we have made.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) on securing this Adjournment debate on the regulation of co-operatives in the European Community. In doing so, I shall add a word of congratulations to the phalanx of supporters who surround him on this occasion. The performance of Labour Members in this Adjournment debate would have done credit to a champion team of tag wrestlers. Although the Labour Benches are more populated than the Conservative Benches, I am sure that the sentiments expressed by hon. Members about the importance and extent of the co-operative movement, the community contribution that it makes in a variety of ways and its size will be echoed and shared by many Conservative Members.

I know about the long interest of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East in this subject, his life time involvement in the co-operative movement and his continuing strong interest in co-operatives, both in the House and outside. He is still chairman of the parliamentary co-operatives group. In that capacity, he and other hon. Members—it is an all-party group—make an important contribution in making the Government and Parliament aware of the important contribution of co-operatives. I share the hon. Gentleman's view of the importance of the co-operative sector in the United Kingdom and take note of his arguments in favour of the European co-operative statute, which is currently under negotiation.

I am well aware of the success enjoyed by many types of mutual organisations, including co-operatives. As the hon. Gentleman knows, most organisations in Great Britain that conduct their business according to the co-operative principles choose to register under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965. There are more than 11,000 such societies, with a total membership of more than 10 million and total assets well in excess of £30 billion. Retail societies provide services to almost 7 million members. They range from corner shops to supermarkets and department stores, as well as public houses and hotels. Other societies cover an enormous diversity of activities.

The traditional values on which co-operatives are based, including the promotion of mutual self-help, may seem to some to be rather out of step with the current highly competitive markets in which many of them operate. But the large number of people who continue to enjoy the benefits of membership clearly demonstrate that co-operatives still have a useful role to play. The Government believe that co-operative values are worth protecting and fostering. Co-operation and competition go hand in hand and history has shown that the movement has faced many challenges and has demonstrated the flexibility, willingness and ability to adapt to those changes.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East highlighted the EC proposals, particularly those for a European co-operative statute and the advantages that it may offer to co-operative organisations which operate in more than one member state, or which are contemplating doing so. The statute is one of three related proposals made by the Commission on organisations in the co-operative, mutual, voluntary and charitable sectors—the so-called economie sociale.

The stated aim of the Commission is, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East said, to create a level playing field for those organisations by allowing them to take advantage of the single market on an equal footing with companies, without having to convert and so lose their current status and character. The Commission has also made it clear that it believes that the statutes form a coherent package and that it expects them to be implemented simultaneously.

The content of the economie sociale statutes and the speed with which discussions on them proceed will depend heavily on developments on the company statute. However, several working group meetings have already taken place in Brussels and officials have embarked on the first article-by-article reading of the co-operative statute.

A year ago, the Government submitted an explanatory memorandum to Parliament, which set out our preliminary views on the Commission's proposals. We agreed that organisations in the economie sociale should be free to take advantage of the single market, but we expressed some doubts that national bodies wishing to operate in more than one member state experienced difficulties in doing so and that there was a useful role for the new legislation proposed by the Commission to play.

To determine the extent to which there was a need, or demand, for EC legislation on the economic sociale, the Government undertook a consultation exercise last year. A wide range of organisations in the co-operative, mutual and charitable sectors was consulted. About 1,200 consultation documents went out to those involved. Views were sought on a variety of issues including the extent of problems under the existing legal framework, the advantages and disadvantages of the statutes and the likelihood that organisations would make use of them. Comments were also invited on the detailed provisions of the statutes and on their interaction with the current EC and national laws.

The Government are now analysing carefully the responses to the consultative document. Officials in the relevant Departments are considering the policy implications of the comments that we have received. Several detailed responses were received and a few meetings have already been held between officials and respondents, including a particularly helpful exchange of views with the United Kingdom Co-operative Council, which represented the views of the co-operative movement in its submissions.

It is clear from the speech and the interventions that have been made tonight that the consultation document and the future of the co-operative movement have attraccted close attention from Members of Parliament. Judging by the importance which they attached to the size and influence of the movement, I hope that they will continue to take part in the consultation process as the Government work on the policy implications of the statute.

I noted in particular and welcomed the important contributions made to tonight's debate by the hon. Members for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen), for Paisley, South (Mr. McMaster), for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman), for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy), for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), for Ilford, South (Mr. Gapes) and for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson). What a roll of honour. I hope that I have not missed anyone out.

I hope that we shall shortly be in a position to present a further explanatory memorandum to Parliament, reporting the results of the consultation exercise. I am sure that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East will understand that it would not be appropriate for me to comment in detail on this, or the implications of the exercise for the United Kingdom's negotiating position. I should like to respond, however, to the points that he has raised by making some general remarks about the Government's policy.

Our view remains that co-operatives and other organisations in the economie sociale should be able to take full advantage of the single market. I believe that the hon. Gentleman shares that view. But we need to gauge carefully, by examining the results of the consultation exercise and from our other contacts with the relevant national organisations, whether they are keen to operate throughout the Community, whether they already do so and, if so, what problems, if any, they are facing.

To the extent that difficulties exist in carrying on cross-border activities, we then need to assess whether the Commission's proposals offer the best way of dealing with them. Among other things, we will have to weigh up carefully the perceived advantages of the new legal framework that the statutes offer, against the cost to member states of having to set up and administer separate regulatory systems or tax regimes for European entities.

It is also essential that the legislation does not compromise the checks and controls provided by the present framework of national legislation, nor contain loopholes which could be exploited by the unscrupulous. We need to make sure that the statutes provide adequate protection for members of the new entities, as well as for those who have dealings with them.

I would not want to pretend that the negotiations on the statutes is a straightforward task, but in that connection, we will be looking closely at the responses we have received to questions in the consultative document on transfer of registered office from one member state to another, on arrangements for supervising the new bodies, on accounting and auditing provisions and on insolvency proceedings. We shall also, of course, want to ensure that those organisations that choose not to operate as a European entity do not suffer any unfair disadvantage compared with those that do.

I have already cited the examples of possible drawbacks and dangers. We must try, at all cost, to avoid some of them. The proposals raise many complex issues which need to be discussed and satisfactory solutions found. Moreover, national legislation in this area varies considerably between member states and opinions tend to differ on even the most apparently basic concepts—such as defining the activities and constitution of a co-operative society.

In our negotiations we will need to bear in mind this background of very different national legislation, varying levels of regulation and different types of organisation across the Community. We must be sure that whatever is to be agreed will work well both in the United Kingdom and in other member states.

It might be suggested that the Government are adopting an unduly cautious approach to the Commission's proposals for legislation on co-operatives and other organisations in the economie sociale. But I think that it is vital to establish at an early stage what difficulties the proposals are designed to address, what opportunities they seek to offer to national entities and whether those entities are likely to take advantage of the opportunities made available to them. Having done that, it is only right to try to anticipate the potential dangers and problems which the proposals raise, alongside the obvious advantages, and to provide constructive criticism.

Let me stress, however, that in all our deliberations, the Government are driven first and foremost by a keen interest in the welfare of co-operatives and of other organisations in the economie sociale sector.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): Can I persuade the Minister to explain to the House some of the dangers that he foresees when co-operatives work across national boundaries, as the Commission has suggested? He has referred to those dangers several times, but I am unaware of them, as, I suspect, are many of my colleagues. It would help the House if the Minister could tell us.

Mr. Nelson: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) for intervening. I have tried to identify some of them during my remarks. There are certain problems associated with the rights of organisations to come into this country under the banner of being a European co-operative organisation under this statute, and we would have to be satisfied that they met the same stringent standards as are subscribed to by the co-operative movement already established in this country. That is one thing on which we would need to be satisfied.

Perhaps more controversially, there are the difficulties that we still envisage within the accompanying directive on worker participation which would go with the statute in this area. Perhaps I could just say a brief word about that in particular, because the experience of the company statute, which has been under discussion for many years now, shows how difficult it can be to reach agreement in this area. The rationale behind the co-operative statute and the two related proposals is to give organisations in the co-operative, mutual and voluntary sectors the same competitive opportunities as companies. Unless agreement is reached on the European company statute, the case for pushing ahead with the economic sociale proposals will be seriously weakened. However, a number of problems remain unresolved on the European statute, including, in particular, important political differences between member states on the provisions for compulsory worker participation in any European company formed under the statute.

The Commission's proposals for co-operatives and other economic social organisations also contain provisions for compulsory worker participation which are likely to cause similar problems for the United Kingdom. These are contained in directives which form part of the three statutes.

The involvement of employees is a vital component in the business plan of all forward-looking companies and organisations wishing to compete effectively in the expanding European market of the 1990s. The United Kingdom is firmly committed to the principle of employers informing and, where appropriate, consulting their employees about matters which affect them. The traditional voluntary approach, which has worked so well for us here, gives employers and employees the flexibility to agree, at local level, the employee involvement arrangements that suit them best.

We will take careful note of all the comments that we have received here tonight and also outside the House. As far as possible, and where they are consistent with wider Government concerns, we will try to reflect respondents' views in the stance that we adopt towards the Commission's proposals. In the final analysis, our decisions will be influenced by the desire to avoid adding to the administrative burden on co-operatives and other organisations that come under the economie sociale banner.

Above all, we must avoid falling into the trap of letting a desire for a level playing field overwhelm the need for a practical and workable approach to the regulation of co-operatives and others, both in the United Kingdom and throughout the European Community. In finding a way forward, we will continue to rely on the helpful and thoughtful contribution, as well as the extensive experience, of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East and his Friends.

Mr. Turner: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I, on behalf of all my parliamentary colleagues, express sincere thanks to the Minister for his positive and encouraging speech tonight? We just hope that he will use his good offices to seek to bring to a speedy and successful conclusion the implementation of the statute. I thank him sincerely for his thoughtful and helpful contribution.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twelve minutes past Twelve midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Eritrea

1. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on the recognition of Eritrea; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): We warmly welcome the outcome of the referendum on Eritrea's status. We plan to announce our decision on diplomatic recognition by the time the Eritreans formally declare their independence.

Mr. Barnes: Immediately after recognition, should not Eritrea be given massive economic aid from the world community? It has suffered considerably from the civil war which has destroyed its infrastructure, it suffered from a drought last year and it has half a million refugees to absorb from the Sudan. In those circumstances, is not our proposal for £500,000 worth of aid for the coming year inadequate, given that the economic recovery plan will cost $2·5 billion?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have given terrific humanitarian assistance to Eritrea—some £12 million worth of aid since January 1992. We are proposing a new bilateral programme of £500,000 worth of assistance a year for that part of the world. With regard to the rehabilitation of displaced persons, the United Nations department of humanitarian affairs will visit Eritrea shortly and make a report. We wish to reserve judgment until we know the outcome of that report before considering any further matters.

Mr. Bowis: Is my hon. Friend aware that the message that I and the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) bring back from Eritrea is that the people there are in remarkably good heart after 30 years of war and devastation and now need to face the next 30 years of economic war, which they will win with world support. Will he examine the possibility of supporting the World bank's initiative on its recovery programme, as well as the United Nations Development Programme for returnees and access to the Lomé IV convention, and also see whether Britain can do something to help with the necessary reforms of the civil service, support for the police and especially the improvement in literacy, given that Eritrea has chosen English as its second language?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: All those matters will certainly be examined—I can say no more than that to my hon. Friend or the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), both of whom attended the referendum as observers. The British Government warmly welcome the referendum result, wish to help Eritrea in the future and will consider their relationship with Eritrea on a positive basis from now on.

Mr. Battle: I thank the Minister for his warm welcome for the referendum result. It was a privilege to be present at the referendum on 23 and 25 April. It was a free and fair vote that represented liberation of the Eritrean people after 30 years of war. Can the Minister ensure that some substantial bilateral and multilateral aid goes immediately to the reconstruction of the vital port of Massawa, which was devastated by bombing and recently revaged by a rare hurricane? That port is central to movements of food aid and the reconstruction of the whole country.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are enormous demands in Eritrea for all sorts of assistance. We are concentrating on the priorities for English language training and agriculture, but we are examining the whole situation.

United Nations Peace Operations

2. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in how many United Nations peacekeeping or peace monitoring operations the United Kingdom plays a part.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): The United Kingdom contributes military personnel to five United Nations peacekeeping operations, including 600 to the force in Cyprus, 15 to the force on the Iraq-Kuwait border, 15 in western Sahara, 122 to the force in Cambodia and 2,500 to the United Nations protection force in former Yugoslavia.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: The House will be impressed by the extent of that list, representing as it does the country's commitment to peacekeeping in the post-cold war period and, above all, the high regard in which British troops are held worldwide. However, does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that we have reached the point in history at which the whole concept and mechanism of United Nations peacekeeping, and possibly peacemaking, should come under review? In that context, will my right hon. and learned Friend give an assurance that, given Britain's permanent membership of the United Nations Security Council and our reputation and abilities, we will maintain the capability to play a full and prominent part?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is right to stress the ever-increasing nature of the peacekeeping operations conducted by the United Nations. He is also right to say that British forces should make a significant contribution to those operations. We do so especially in the present operations in Bosnia to convey humanitarian supplies. However, I think that my hon. Friend would also agree that we cannot participate in every peacekeeping mission: we have to determine priorities.

Mr. Rogers: I am sure that the Government, with all of us in the House, view with great concern the decision of the Russians to veto the reform of the United Nations financing of the peacekeeping force in Cyprus. Combined with the withdrawal of the Canadian contribution some time in June, that will inevitably put an added burden on this country. In view of the present poor state of our defence forces and the Treasury-driven cuts in the "Options for Change" process, will we be able to fulfil those commitments, which are limited at present?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman was right to draw attention to the Russian vote last night. That is a matter which must be considered. But I return to the point that I made. We cannot participate in every peacekeeping force. We have to make choices. Our contribution to peacekeeping forces is recognised as among the most effective made by any member of the United Nations.

Mr. Colvin: If we participate in the number of peacekeeping activities that my right hon. and learned Friend said, that means that there are another 12 in which the United Kingdom is not involved with the United Nations. There are a further eight civil wars going on around the world where the United Nations is not involved and another 25 flashpoints where war could break out at any time, so the role of the United Nations is bound to increase.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes) has a good point. The United Nations must convene, deliberate and determine how it will reach agreement on keeping the peace throughout the world and implementing the Secretary-General's "Agenda for Peace", and how it will enforce Security Council resolutions which it passes.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the many parts of the world and operations in which we could make a contribution. That rather emphasises the point that I have already made. One must make choices about where the priorities lie. It is also worth reminding my hon. Friend that, for example, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe can operate in a peacekeeping role, sometimes under the direct authority of the United Nations and sometimes free standing. Therefore, it is a question of making priorities and seeing whether regional organisations can sometimes take some of the strain.

Sir David Steel: Does the Minister accept that the number of forces required for peacekeeping operations would be smaller if they could be deployed in a more timely manner? Does not that underline the importance of the Secretary-General's report "Agenda for Peace", in which he talks about member nations ascribing and allocating forces on a permanent basis to the United Nations? Is that now part of Her Majesty's Government's official policy and, if so, what are the implications for "Options for Change"?

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that sometimes timely action can prevent a more substantial contribution later. There is rather a good example of that in Macedonia where, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, there is now a battalion of United Nations authorised troops in a pre-emptive role. I suspect that over the years we shall see rather more of that.

Hungary

3. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Hungary in the light of his recent visit to Hungary.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I accompanied Her Majesty the Queen on part of her highly successful state visit to Hungary last week. I have had talks with the President, the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister. Our relations are in good shape. The Hungarians know that we support their wish to become full members of the European Community when practicable and that meanwhile we are working to make a success of the Community's association agreement with them, particularly by opening the Community's market increasingly to their goods. British investment in Hungary and trade with Hungary are growing and there is scope for plenty more of both. The British know-how fund is an acknowledged success, with many good projects coming forward.

Mr. Jenkin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the early accession of Hungary and other states like it to the European Community is at the core of our relations with that country? Can he say when that might be? As the European Parliament's consent is required for the accession of new members to the treaty of Rome, will existing member states be required to give up more power in order to obtain that consent?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that my hon. Friend's second point is very strong. The treaty of Rome provides under article 237 that the Parliament must agree to new accessions. That is not changed under the proposed treaty of Maastricht. Any change in the powers of Parliament is a matter for treaty. But my hon. Friend is right on his first point. Full membership of the Community is one of Hungary's main objectives and we are in favour of its achieving that as soon as practicable. It knows and we know that it is not possible to set an exact date at present.

Dr. Howells: Did the Secretary of State make it clear to the Hungarian Government that the British Government would take a dim view of any encouragement that might be given to the ethnic Hungarians who live in Transylvania and to the secessionist groups that are beginning to surface there?

Mr. Hurd: The Hungarians expressed the view clearly to me that they do not seek a change in the international borders of Romania, but they are understandably anxious that the Hungarians in Transylvania should be given a proper degree of autonomy.

Yugoslavia

4. Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on achieving a long-term solution to the political problems in the former republic of Yugoslavia.

5. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures he assesses to be the most effective in bringing to an end the fighting in Bosnia Herzegovina.

8. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest United Kingdom position over the conflict in former Yugoslavia.

9. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place with other United Nations countries regarding the conflict in former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Despite the intransigence of the Bosnian Serbs, we continue to regard the Vance-Owen plan as an indispensable lead into peace in Bosnia. Our policies are directed towards getting the Bosnian Serbs to accept the plan, carry it out in good faith and desist from further attacks. That means increasing the pressure on them by stepping up still further the growing effectiveness of sanctions and testing the declared will of President Milosevic to carry out his intention to cut off supplies to the Bosnian Serbs and allow international monitoring of the border. In case the Bosnian Serbs cannot be persuaded to comply, we are considering with our partners and allies the possibility of using stronger measures, not excluding military options. We also agreed in the Foreign Affairs Council on Monday on the need to express to the Government of Croatia our dismay at recent actions by Bosnian Croats in central Bosnia and around Mostar.

Mr. Ancram: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply and welcome the fact that he has not been driven off his sensible dual-track approach by ill-judged insults from certain safely distant American politicians during the past few days. In that context, will my right hon. Friend welcome the constructive statement from the American Government today that deployment of United States ground troops in Macedonia is being considered, particularly as it will give the American public a better appreciation of the complexities of what is happening on the ground throughout the former republic of Yugoslavia?

Mr. Hurd: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. I do not thing that it serves any purpose to start exchanging accusations across the Atlantic. I do not think that some of those remarks would have been made if those concerned had seen the exchanges that have taken place between the allies in recent days, or if they had understood the nature of the effort and the risks which some of us, including Britain, are making in Bosnia at the present time. I agree with my hon. Friend's second point. If the United States were to decide to reinforce the Nordic battalion in Macedonia already referred to, that would be welcome from our point of view.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Does the Foreign Secretary accept that it is more than ever important that aggression, wherever it comes from, is not seen to be rewarded? As more and more ground is gained by that aggression, with the loss of Srebrenica and Zepa, it becomes more difficult to secure the peace. Can the Foreign Secretary therefore say what measures he will recommend to the allies to ensure that Gorazde does not suffer the same fate?

Mr. Hurd: The Serbs have not, of course, occupied either Srebrenica or Zepa. In my main answer I dealt, I think, with the hon. Gentleman's point. We believe that so long as the Bosnian Serbs continue to push forward in eastern Bosnia, the pressures against them must be built up. The new element in the last few weeks is the declared intention of President Milosevic to put pressure on the Bosnian Serbs. That is being partly carried out. It needs to be tested. What we and the Americans have recently agreed, and what is now being carried forward in the Security Council, is that we should propose and agree that there should be monitors along the border between Bosnia and Serbia so as to prevent the flow of illegal traffic.

Mr. Winnick: Is the Foreign Secretary aware that there is bound to be much disappointment that the leading western countries have not—so far at least—been able to get their act together in dealing with Serbian aggression and vile ethnic cleansing? As for the Foreign Secretary's reference to Belgrade, is not it a fact that if the Belgrade leadership appears to be—I emphasise "appears to be" —dissociating itself from the Bosnian Serb warlords, it is because of the fear of armed intervention? Should not that lesson be carefully learnt, be it here in western Europe or in the United States?

Mr. Hurd: The allies are agreed on the effort which we are carrying forward. That is to say, the Europeans, the Americans and the Russians are agreed on the need for a political process—I have mentioned the Vance-Owen plan —on the need for effective sanctions, with the Americans and the Europeans working together, and on the need for the humanitarian effort: our troops on the ground, a big United Nations effort and the United States and other air drops. All that is agreed and is going forward. There is consultation on further measures. As for the hon. Gentleman's second point, one can never be sure what moves people to change their policy. It may be the undoubtedly growing effectiveness of sanctions. It may be, as he suggested, the hints of possible military action, which we are not excluding. One cannot be sure. Nor is it certain that the change is a substantial and permanent one. That is what now has to be tested.

Mr. Connarty: Is the Foreign Secretary aware of the perception outside the House of the lowering cloud of shame over the Governments of Europe and America because of the lack of military intervention? That does not include, obviously, the troops we have put there who are giving humanitarian aid. Is the Foreign Secretary aware that at a meeting in this very House the Bosnian Foreign Secretary and the Bosnian UN envoy said that we are keeping their people alive until the Serbs come to kill them? Is not it time to end the delay, to stop buck-passing to the Americans and to commit ourselves to military intervention to deal with ethnic cleansing and create a safe haven now for those Bosnians who are left in their own country?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is the first I have heard in the House, throughout many months of debate, to propose a military intervention on the ground to impose a particular solution. No Government whom I know of, and certainly not the Government of the United States, propose that. The House debated this matter on 29 April. I carried away from that debate the very strong feeling from all parts of the House, although not from all individuals, that hon. Members were in favour of the pressures that we are building up and of the line that we are taking and that they were also in favour of substantial prudence before going into further types of involvement without calculating the consequences. The kind of phrases that fell from the hon. Gentleman's lips are a little bit easy for those who do not carry the responsibility for the result.

Mr. Cormack: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the situation in and around Mostar is becoming increasingly critical? Is he further aware that President Izetbegovic has asked for Mostar to be declared a protected zone? Will he give his support to that request?

Mr. Hurd: I had not heard of that request. The situation in Mostar is serious, but the Spanish troops—the European troops who are escorting humanitarian convoys in that area—have done their best to calm things down. Ceasefires have been negotiated and I believe that there has been some dying away of the fighting, although it comes and goes. We take the matter very seriously and I know that the German Foreign Minister is going to Zagreb. The presidency of the Community, as a result of our meeting on Monday, will express our deep concern to the Croats about the matter, as there is no doubt that the main responsibility is theirs.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I understand my right hon. Friend's reluctance to avoid trading insults across the Atlantic, but is not there support in the Senate, and possibly in the Administration of the President, for arming the Bosnian Muslims? Is it still the Government's view that that would seriously jeopardise the humanitarian relief that we give the Bosnian Serbs, Muslims and others and that were we to agree to such an American request that work would have to be abandoned and other initiatives that have already taken would be jeopardised?

Mr. Hurd: The House discussed this subject on 29 April and the right hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and other hon. Members supported our reasons for having reservations about this option, not the least of which is the one that my hon. Friend mentioned. It is hard to imagine how the humanitarian effort and the troops escorting the convoys could continue—at least in their present form—if that option were taken. No option has been excluded, because the situation may change, but our position on that particular option has not changed.

Dr. John Cunningham: Is not one of the tragic lessons of the middle east that pouring armaments into areas of instability and conflict does not lead to early political solutions or to peace? Should not we emphasise that point to those who want the United Nations arms embargo on Bosnia to be ended?

Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider what he said a few moments ago about the Croatians? Is not an expression of dismay a slap on the wrist for the Croatians? Should not we take the same attitude to the Croatians as we take to the Bosnian Serbs and is not the time long overdue for the Security Council to make explicit its ultimatum to the Serbs and the Croatians that, if they do not sign the ceasefire and uphold it, limited air strikes will be used against them?

The right hon. Gentleman should support, as he has hitherto, the urgent need to strengthen the United Nations presence in Macedonia and significantly to increase the presence of Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe monitors in Kosovo to make it clear to President Milosevic that we need convincing of his good faith in respect of Kosovo and Macedonia.

Mr. Hurd: I have sketched out again our position on air strikes and the arms embargo, which has not really altered since our debate on 29 April. There was some discussion in the Foreign Affairs Council on Monday about whether we should begin to think of sanctions against Croatia. We reached the conclusion that that was not justified at this stage, but the Croatians should have no doubt that, if the kind of incident that occurred in central Bosnia and has now occurred again in Mostar continues, they cannot expect to have the kind of relationship with the European Community or the international community that they expected.

I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman's point about Macedonia, where a Nordic battalion is in place. If it were strengthened—for example, by an American decision to put ground troops into Macedonia—that would be welcome. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, we have recognised Macedonia; it is a member of the United Nations and Lord Owen and Cyrus Vance are trying to sort out the detailed implications. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman's point about strengthening the CSCE presence in Kosovo.

6. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet his European Community counterparts to discuss developments in former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Former Yugoslavia will be discussed at the next General Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 8 June.

Sir Michael Neubert: I pay full tribute to the humanitarian contribution made by British forces in Bosnia, but is not the painful reality that it has saved thousands from being starved to death at the price of thousands of others being shelled to death and that Cambodian-type atrocities will continue unless effective deterrent action is taken? Does not relevant 20th century experience tell us that for defending freedom from ruthless aggressors there is no substitute for a strong Anglo-American alliance, compared with which an attempt to secure agreement and joint action among 12 European nations is little more than a mirage?

Mr. Hogg: It is right to be absolutely clear that many thousands of people in Bosnia are now living who would have been dead, but for the delivery of humanitarian supplies over many months, and that much credit for that goes to the British troops now in Bosnia and to the Royal Air Force. We must also recognise that what we face in Bosnia is essentially a civil war. It is true that it has been supported by men and munitions from Serbia and, as has been made plain by many hon. Members, from Croatia too. In essence, however, it is a civil war and we need to reinforce the pressure now on Serbia to get President Milosevic to put yet more pressure on the Bosnian Serbs to subscribe to a peace agreement.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Does the Minister agree that we must learn lessons from the tragedy now occurring in Yugoslavia, one of which is that the precipitate recognition of the new republics by the European Community exacerbated the problems there? Does the Minister further agree that if there is recognition in other parts of Europe in the coming months and years, hand in hand with recognition there must be an agreement recognising the rights of minorities both within the state with which they reside and in any neighbouring state with which they may have linguistic or other relations?

Mr. Hogg: It is true that the British Government were more cautious about recognising Croatia than were a number of our European colleagues, but by the time we recognised Croatia we all judged that the grounds for refusing recognition no longer existed. The same applied in the case of Bosnia. The hon. Gentleman will keep in mind that there was a referendum, and an independent report commissioned by the EC, in the light of which it would have been difficult to withhold recognition of Bosnia. The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point about minority rights, and it is certainly true in the context of the entirety of former Yugoslavia that the preservation of minority rights within the frontiers is of key importance to any peace settlement.

Mr. Fry: When my right hon. and learned Friend talks to our European partners, will he point out that although the British people are anxious to play their part in resolving the problems in Bosnia, they would appreciate greater assistance from other members of the Community in terms of sending their forces to be shot at and put into danger? If there is to be a general Community solution to the problem, it should not be left mainly to the British and French forces to carry out the peacekeeping in the name of the European Community. I believe that if that were achieved, my right hon. and learned Friend would find much greater agreement about the way forward, and perhaps rather less resistance to the effective use of British forces.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes a point of substance. He was right to pay tribute to the French Government for their very substantial contribution. The Spanish Government, too, have contributed. There are also countries which, by reason of their history or their constitutions, or both, would find it rather difficult to make a contribution in what was Yugoslavia.

On the question of peacekeeping, which is a different matter from what is currently happening in the former Yugoslavia, we look for a substantial contribution from outside the European Community. Naturally, I have in mind the deployment of substantial numbers of ground troops by the United States if a peacekeeping force were organised to underpin an agreement.

South Africa

7. Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with representatives of the South African Government following the murder of Chris Hani; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have made every effort to help minimise the effect of the tragic assassination of Chris Hani on the negotiating process in South Africa, including the provision of a senior police officer to help with the investigation.

Miss Lestor: Following the distinguished and dignified address given by Mr. Nelson Mandela during his recent visit to this country, as well as the death of Chris Hani and the revelation of the alleged plots against other people involved in the constitutional process, will the Minister press on Mr. de Klerk and all others the urgent need to secure an early settlement in the constitutional discussions so that the next stage may be reached? Will the Government also make it perfectly clear to Chief Buthelezi that they will provide no support at all for his proposals concerning separatism, which at best would delay the constitutional talks and at worst could create in South Africa the sort of tragedy now engulfing Yugoslavia?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I wholly endorse the hon. Lady's words about Nelson Mandela's visit last week, which was interesting and remarkable to us all. With regard to the constitutional process in South Africa, the hon. Lady will be aware that negotiations reopened on 26 April—a week after Chris Hani's dreadful assassination. The negotiating council has now agreed that a date for the election should be set before June and that the election should be held before the end of April 1994. Substantial progress has been made. The constitutional process is, of course, a matter for and between the various parties in South Africa. That is all that I can say about that aspect of the matter.

Mr. John Carlisle: While my hon. Friend is right to offer the South African Government support for their move towards multiracial democracy, may I ask him to urge on them some caution with regard to the pace of reform? Does he agree that until all parties—including the Inkatha Freedom party and, despite current circumstances, members of the Conservative party—are involved in the decision-making process and the discussions, any move towards an early general election would be fatal for South Africa?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As I have already indicated, the negotiating council has tentatively agreed arrangements for setting a date for a general election in South Africa. Clearly it is for the negotiating council to proceed at such pace as it collectively judges would be wise in all the circumstances facing that country.

Dr. John Cunningham: Was not Nelson Mandela's persistence in calling for peace and reconciliation quite remarkable, and should it not be applauded, especially in the light of the assassination of his colleague Chris Hani and the known assassination threats faced daily by other leading members of the African National Congress? Would it not be beneficial to all parties in South Africa to move quickly to the formation of a transitional executive council, thus allowing all-party supervision of the defence and police forces in South Africa? Would not that, in turn, help to batten down the violence—if not end it, at least in the beginning contain it—and thereby hasten the achievement of non-racial democracy?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am happy to endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments about Mr. Nelson Mandela, whose call for calm and measured reactions in the light of what must be dreadful provocation for so many people in South Africa is greatly to be applauded. The security situation in South Africa is primarily the responsibility of the South African Government, but it behoves all other people of influence to seek to restrain emotions which must be running high. As to the transitional executive council, I agree that its establishment will be beneficial. It will also enable the lifting of all sanctions to take place, as recommended by the ANC.

EC Foreign Policy

10. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next proposes to have discussions with his European Community partners concerning the development of common European Community foreign policies.

Mr. Hurd: I meet our European Community partners regularly to discuss the strengthening of intergovernmental co-operation on foreign policy.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend agree that this country can exert much more influence in the world when we work in unison with our European Community partners than when we operate on our own? Does he further agree that the Maastricht treaty will greatly facilitate that process and enable this country to exert more influence in the world?

Mr. Hurd: On a good many subjects, what my hon. Friend says is true. The principle on which we operate today, and which will be strengthened in the Maastricht treaty, is that where we can reach common positions we can take joint action. Where we cannot, or where specific national interests are to be pursued, individual member states must be free to do that.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Before the Foreign Secretary meets his European partners, will he take time to study the important report in Al Wasat of an interview between President Hafiz Al-Assad of Syria and Patrick Seale? In that interview President Assad recognised publicly for the first time, so far as I can recall, that both Israelis and Palestinians have to live in Palestine, and that the Syrians are for full peace with full withdrawal. He also recognised the growing opinion in Israel for peace. Will the Foreign Secretary recommend to his European partners that they support the statements made by President Assad in that interview?

Mr. Hurd: We have throughout given strong support to the discussions under the peace process. That includes discussions between Israel and Syria, and, of course, Israel and the Palestinians.

Sir Jim Spicer: Does my right hon. Friend accept that while all our attention is naturally directed towards events in Yugoslavia, other wars and civil wars are raging in what was the Soviet Union? Will he give an assurance that there will always be time to discuss those dreadful events and killings, and in particular the awfulness of the war that is developing between Armenia and Azerbaijan?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed. It is the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe rather than the European Community which is attempting to provide a political framework for an agreement between Armenia and Azerbaijan over Nagorno-Karabakh, and we strongly support that process.

Mr. Grocott: When the Foreign Secretary next meets his European counterparts, will he draw to their attention the important resolution of the European Parliament on 22 April, drawing attention to the tragic position in Angola where, because of the colonial legacy, Europe has a special responsibility? In particular, will he draw attention to the way in which the will of the international community is constantly being flouted by the UNITA forces? Will he take note of the contents of that resolution, which draws attention to the crucial importance of isolating the forces of UNITA from support from outside, particularly from South Africa and Zaire, and of seeing that the United States recognises and supports the Angolan Government, who represent the democratic will of the Angolan people?

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure about what the hon. Gentleman says about the colonial legacy—that was some time ago—but I believe that UNITA and Savimbi have lost, and deserved to lose, a good deal of international sympathy for failing to accept the results of the recent election in Angola. There is no alternative to discussion between the MPLA Government and UNITA, and it should be the task of all, particularly those who gave strong support to UNITA, to make sure that those discussions take place and succeed.

Sweden

11. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the Swedish Foreign Minister to discuss Sweden's future relationship with the EC.

Mr. Hurd: I met Mrs. Af Uglass on 26 April in Stockholm and the Prime Minister, Mr. Bildt, the following day. I confirmed our strong support for a successful conclusion to Sweden's negotiations now going on to join the Community.

Mr. Spring: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that it is very much in Britain's interest that the membership of the European Community is enlarged and open to countries that are suitable for membership? Does he agree that the accession of Sweden, a country with which we have many links, will strengthen the EC's economic base and open up further opportunities to Britain in an expanding single market?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed. We look forward warmly to the day when Sweden joins the Community. We want the negotiations with the four applicants—Sweden, Finland, Austria and Norway—to press ahead as soon as possible so that, preferably, they go through all the processes and become full members by 1995.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that before any question of accession by Sweden to the EC, there is the matter of the European Economic Area, and a 550-page treaty, which is now under discussion? Since the Swiss have decided not to go ahead on that for the time being, can the Foreign Secretary tell us about the position of Sweden? Is it not a fact that accession to this treaty would mean considerable economic, commercial and legal obligations for Sweden? Have they been fully understood in Sweden, and would it have to have a referendum before acceding?

Mr. Hurd: The arrangements that have been made between the European Free Trade Area countries since the result of the Swiss referendum on the EEA are freely entered into by Sweden and fully understood by it. So the process of EEA is going forward and, at the same time, negotiations are making progress between Sweden and the European Community on its full accession.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that the rapid accession of Sweden and the other EFTA countries to the EC would result in a far more pragmatic and financially advantageous view of the expenditure within the EC?

Mr. Hurd: I think that they would all be net contributors, if that is what my hon. Friend is hinting at. There are wider and more political reasons why we in this country—and, I believe, most of the Community now—would warmly welcome the arrival as full members of the Community of those four countries. They are all well qualified and they would all, as far as we are concerned, be warmly welcomed.

United Nations Peace Operations

12. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the role of the United Nations Organisation as a peacekeeper.

Mr. Hurd: Article 1.1 of the charter of the United Nations states that the purpose of the United Nations is "to maintain international peace and security and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace."

We fully support the United Nations and the Secretary-General in these endeavours.

Mr. Griffiths: Will the Secretary of State admit that so far, unfortunately, the record of the United Nations has in no way lived up to what is contained in the charter? Will he accept that, while we are now seeing some improvement in the role of the United Nations, we need the following: first, a very rigorous regime of arms control to try to end the possibilities of the sort of wars that we are seeing all over the world; secondly, a permanent structure to react quickly to events such as those occurring in Yugoslavia, where, because everybody was at sixes and sevens, we have seen a tragedy unfolding before our eyes and have been virtually powerless to do very much that is effective about it?

Mr. Hurd: We are all in favour, and have taken initiatives in making, more transparent and open the criteria for the sale of arms, particularly among the permanent five. However, I ask the hon. Gentleman to live in the real world in which arms, particularly small arms, are plentiful and cheap in almost every country.

We are now seeing disorder within countries. It is not realistic to suppose that, even if the whole international community were united, for example, on what should be the future of Nagorno-Karabakh or the regime in Angola or Somalia, simply by forming a view from outside we will be able to impose solutions on the internal affairs of those countries. We can be more willing to try, not by putting in troops but by making diplomatic efforts to show people ways in which they can live together. However, I ask the hon. Gentleman not to arouse too many hopes in that respect.

At the beginning of 1992 there were 10,000 United Nations peacekeeping troops; at the beginning of 1993 there were 60,000; and when the planned deployments in Mozambique and Somalia happen there will be 100,000 in 12 separate operations. That is the measure of the growth of this problem and of the efforts of the United Nations to deal with it.

Sir Michael Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most important ways of ensuring the peacekeeping process of the United Nations, particularly after a period of civil war, is through the organisation of free and fair elections? In that context, will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity to send good wishes to all those who will be involved in the process in Cambodia, including hon. Members and local government officials who, with other international representatives, will be leaving for Cambodia next week?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is quite right. Cambodia is one example where the United Nations has, for the moment, brought most of the fighting to an end and set up a framework in which there can, and should be, relatively free elections later this month. The situation is fragile, however, and my hon. Friend is right that all those concerned need our help and good wishes.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I welcome the Secretary of State's comment that the situation in Cambodia is fragile. Can he enlighten us as to how far the peacekeeping efforts of United Nations are impeded by the lack of finance from one of its largest participants? Does he accept that in Yugoslavia, where our troops are now changing over, humanitarian efforts were being hindered by those who were seeking to use the convoys bringing in aid for the purpose of supplying munitions? It would be worse if the United Nations were arming the participants there.

Mr. Hurd: It is true that one of the handicaps that the Secretary-General has suffered and draws attention to in his "Agenda for Peace" is financial uncertainty. Unfortunately, both former super-powers have in the past contributed to that uncertainty. I hope that both are removing that uncertainty. That is certainly the intention of President Clinton, but I am not encouraged by the Russian veto in the Security Council yesterday on financing peacekeeping. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's second point: we want to continue the humanitarian effort while it is needed.

Russia

13. Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the effect on United Kingdom policy of the result of the recent referendum in Russia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have warmly welcomed the outcome of last month's referendum in Russia. Our policy remains one of firm support for the continuation of economic and democratic reforms. This policy has now been endorsed by the Russian electorate.

Mr. Ainsworth: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the sheer scale of the support shown by the Russian people for Boris Yeltsin and the programme of reforms gives a tremendous boost to international confidence in the long-term future of Russia? Does he also agree that in the near term substantial aid will be necessary to help the difficult process of economic transformation? Will he therefore comment on the quantity and quality of Britain's aid to Russia?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is right. He will know that last month my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary announced a doubling of United Kingdom direct bilateral grant aid, together with a doubling of Export Credits Guarantee Department cover. Our total commitment to Russia is of the order of $1·7 billion. Referring to the quality of the aid, the United Kingdom's know-how fund is second to nor : as a mechanism for the delivery of technical know-how.

Mr. Cryer: If the Minister welcomes a referendum in Russia to clarify the position, why does he not take the same view of a referendum in the United Kingdom on the Maastricht treaty? It would clarify the position, and involve the people of the United Kingdom in determining whether to go ahead with this wretched treaty or reject it. If the people of Russia can have a democratic vote, why not the people of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hogg: I have always known that the hon. Gentleman has a personality difficulty when it comes to judging things in relation to other things. He obviously equates the congress in Russia, which was elected under the Gorbachev regime, with this place. I do not, and I am sorry that he does.

BBC World Service

14. Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the BBC World Service.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The World Service is an institution of great influence and prestige throughout the world. The substantial real increase in resources that we have provided, and are providing again this financial year, has enabled it to improve audibility, expand output and enhance programme quality.

Mr. Bates: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer, and for reaffirming the Government's priority in maintaining the strength and position of the BBC World Service as the leading international broadcaster. Does my hon. Friend agree that in times of international conflict and uncertainty the need for an independent and unbiased news service around the world is greater than ever? Does he further agree that this can sometimes be best achieved by placing special emphasis on developing new language services so that the programmes broadcast become more widely accessible to the people whom they seek to serve?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend about the leading role that the World Service plays in the world of international broadcasting and its tremendous achievements. It is due to Foreign and Commonwealth Office recognition of those achievements, which have been followed by substantial assistance and funding that the World Service has been able to do so well in recent years. In the past three year funding period, for example, broadcasts were increased by more than 10 per cent. and two new languages in areas of tension—Ukrainian and Albanian—were introduced.

Mr. George Robertson: Is the Minister aware that his views on the World Service, and those of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates), are shared throughout the House? The service is held in the highest esteem throughout the globe, not just in terms of the quality of its broadcasting but in terms of its reliability. It is widely regarded as the most reliable broadcasting service on the planet. Does the Minister recognise that there is genuine concern about the future funding of the World Service, given that it has been warned that it may well face substantial cuts in the Treasury spending blitz that is ahead of us? If it were to share in those cuts and its service were cut back, that would be not just a disgrace but hugely counterproductive to Britain's national interest.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am fully aware of the widespread acclaim for the World Service in all parts of the House and I emphasise that the funding increase for the World Service from the Foreign Office budget over the past 10 years or so has been 40 per cent. in real terms. This year, the increase has been £10 million, which is way above the rate of inflation. What has happened—this is what the hon. Gentleman is referring to—is that the Foreign Office has been in touch with the World Service and said that, depending on the outcome of the public expenditure survey, we shall have to have discussions and if the Foreign Office is unable to meet the aspirations of the World Service, its funding will be put on the same footing as the rest of the Foreign Office budget when it comes to reviewing expenditure.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, on a previous occasion when the Treasury required economies to be made in the foreign service budget, one of the economies made was to close down Spanish broadcasts to Latin America a few weeks before the Argentines invaded the Falkland Islands? Will he make absolutely certain that this immensely valuable institution, which does more for British influence and prestige throughout the world than probably any other activity of the Foreign Office, is protected from the next round of economy cuts?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am grateful to receive the message of my hon. Friend in the spirit of support for the World Service. I do not believe that there are any cuts in prospect in terms of languages from the World Service. My hon. Friend has referred to an earlier occasion when there were threats; it is since then that the World Service has expanded in such a tremendous way.

Swan Hunter

3.30 pm

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston) (by private notice): To ask the President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on what help he will offer Tyneside in the wake of the loss of the naval contract by Swan Hunter.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): The Government deeply regret that Swan Hunter has been unable to secure orders, including that for the new helicopter carrier for the Ministry of Defence. We are well aware of the potential loss of jobs both at the yard and among suppliers. The company will need to take decisions in the light of the failure to win orders and these decisions are likely to involve early job losses.

In the event of substantial job losses, the Government are considering a number of measures to help the area. We would intend to designate a new enterprise zone in the area and will urgently examine possible sites. This would be subject to European Commission agreement. English Estates would implement an important £2·5 million industrial development at Walker Riverside in conjunction with the city council and Tyne and Wear development corporation. The Tyneside training and enterprise council and employment service locally would offer an enhanced range of labour market help to those affected by the closures.

In addition, I can confirm now, ahead of the results of the assisted area map review, that both Newcastle and south Tyneside travel-to-work areas will retain their development area status, subject to agreement with the European Commission. Availability of regional selective assistance will be important in attracting new investment and new jobs. We are putting into immediate effect the Tyneside TEC plan for dealing with the closure of Westoe colliery, which is designed to help the whole area and not just those leaving the colliery. A further £2 million will be available to Tyne and Wear development corporation from the additional £20 million recently made available for coal regeneration measures for increased provision of new industrial sites in the area.

The area already benefits from support from many regional and urban schemes. The Government will be examining urgently how priorities can be focused within these schemes to help the area. I have asked my Department's regional director in the north-east, with colleagues from the Departments of the Environment and Employment, to co-ordinate all those concerned locally with regional regeneration to advise on how they can target resources most effectively to have an early impact in attracting new employment.

We do not in any way underestimate the importance that shipbuilding and Swan Hunter in particular have had for Tyneside. I hope that all concerned will co-operate to build on the measures that I have announced today.

Mr. Cook: Will the Minister confirm that last November he was warned by the constituency Members that Swan Hunter would be at risk of closure if it lost the naval contract? Are we to understand from the measures that he has just announced that the Government have not a single proposal to try to keep open the last remaining shipbuilding yard on Tyneside? Does he appreciate that, if they intend to do anything to save the yard, the situation is now urgent, and that even as we discuss the matter the directors of the company are meeting the bankers? Surely the Government can announce something that they will do to continue shipbuilding at this yard, a yard which has already secured two export orders which could be lost if it were to close?

Does not the crisis at Swan Hunter provide a clear example of why we must plan ahead for conversion of defence industries that are losing defence orders?

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that Swan Hunter cannot get help from the European intervention fund to diversify because the Government agreed at the time of privatisation that British warship yards would be excluded? Will he return to Brussels and get that changed after today?

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that every part of the yard we are discussing is within the boundary of an urban development corporation which is appointed by the Government and accountable to the Government? What extra resources will it receive to cope with any extra need?

In the light of the right hon. Gentleman's statement about enterprise zones, will he give us an undertaking that, if Swan Hunter falls, the Government's own urban development corporation will use its planning powers to stop those high-tech facilities in the yard being demolished to make way for service industries, for warehousing or for supermarkets? Will it then try to find another operator to bring work to one of the most modern shipyards in Europe, with some of the most skilled people in Europe?

Already in the shipbuilding yards on both banks of the Tyne one in three men is out of work. If Swan Hunter closes, one in two could be on the dole. It is not just Tyneside, but the nation, that will have its eyes on the Government to see whether they can rise to the gravity of the crisis and match it now with help on the same scale as the blow they have just delivered to the local community.

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) asked a number of questions. Underlying many of those questions appeared to be an attitude that belittled the achievements of enterprise zones and of urban development corportions. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Tyne and Wear urban development corporation has already created 10,000 jobs. Is he not aware of the success of other enterprise zones in job creation? Is he suggesting that Tyneside should spurn those offers of help? That seemed to be underlying what he said.

The second thing that seemed to underlie the hon. Gentleman's questions was the suggestion that the yard should stay open regardless of the market for its products. If that is his attitude, I fear he must be the only person in the House who is not aware of the excess capacity in shipbuilding and, in particular, in warship building. I wonder why he does not recognise the advantage to that area of a transition from excessive dependence upon the old industries of coal, shipbuilding and steel to a more diversified economy, with vehicles, pharmaceuticals and electronics providing employment that will last and provide opportunities in the future.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): My right hon. Friend must be well aware that the announcement that Swans has lost by a very large margin is a cruel blow for Tyneside. We welcome the steps taken today, but it is absolutely essential that the local initiative that will come from Tyneside, the local effort, be matched on a sustained basis by national Government. [Interruption.]

May we have a promise that every Government— [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must desist.

Mr. Trotter: May we have a commitment that every Government Department and agency will have its resources harnessed to this task?

Will my right hon. Friend pay an early visit to Tyneside to hear of the problem for himself? Does he agree that we have on Tyneside a very valuable asset in the labour force at Swan Hunter, who are highly trained, very skilled, hard working and flexible? Is not that an attraction for new industry?

Mr. Sainsbury: I am happy to confirm what my hon. Friend said about the skill of the work force and, even more importantly, about the commitment of the people of Tyneside to build on the opportunities that they are given through the measures that I have announced and through the programmes that are already in place there. They have the opportunity to build a more diversified and prosperous industrial future for a region with a very great past in industries that, sadly, are now fading.

I am also happy to confirm to my hon. Friend that I shall make early arrangements to visit the region this month.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Does not the Minister realise that all the measures, many of which we have already, are not enough even to replace the mining jobs that we are losing in the north-east, let alone to replace the jobs of all the skilled shipyard workers who will be put out of work as a result of a devastating decision for Tyneside? Does not the Minister also realise that the most useful thing that he could do would be to tell the Secretary of State for Defence to bring forward orders for type 23 frigates now so that there would be some shipbuilding work for the yard?

As a Minister whose Department is responsible for monopoly policy, will the right hon. Gentleman investigate and ascertain whether the order that was placed was in any way subsidised by the profits from the Trident contract? If that were so, it would mean that a monopoly supplier was buying its way into another monopoly.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am assured that there is no question of underbidding. The price tendered by the successful bidder was broadly in line with the expectations of the Ministry of Defence. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman recognises that, if the order had gone the other way, it would have been very bad news for two other areas of the United Kingdom.

I find it rather surprising that the right hon. Gentleman, who is a member of a party that has on a number of occasions and in a number of documents called for more substantial and earlier reductions in defence expenditure, now seems to be calling on the Ministry of Defence to order ships for which it has no immediate requirement.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham): I welcome the package of measures that my right hon. Friend has announced today, although I am bound to say that the House and my constituents who work in the Swan Hunter yard would have preferred to celebrate today the placing of the order for ships with that yard. We await fuller details of the tender so that we can be satisfied that like was compared with like in awarding the contract.

Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the work force and the management of Swan Hunter on their valiant efforts in the past months? They have done their utmost to secure the order—sadly, only to fall at the last fence.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am happy to join my hon. Friend in that and to recognise the skills and commitment of the work force. We all wish to see those skills and that work force find job opportunities, if not in that yard then elsewhere, and we wish them to build on what I have announced and on the schemes already in place.

The tender, of course, is a matter primarily for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement. I am assured that the tender was awarded on a like-for-like basis and that it was genuinely won with a substantial price difference by Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. and its partner Kvaerner.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): Tyneside does not want ministerial day-trippers; it wants positive action from the Government. The sense of despair and disappointment felt yesterday on Tyneside as a result of the announcement will turn today to anger and a sense of betrayal as a result of the Minister's complacent statement. The Government stand condemned for doing nothing to help the thousands of workers who depend on Swan Hunter.

Is the Minister aware that there is a widely held view that the announcement to award the hull to the Clyde, which would mean thousands of Tyneside jobs being sacrificed, was rushed forward to yesterday so that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could take some good news to the Scottish Tory party conference which starts today in Edinburgh? Will the Government, even at this late stage, take positive steps to preserve and protect shipbuilding at Swan Hunter, or will they simply do nothing and stand to one side to witness the end of shipbuilding on the Tyne?

Mr. Sainsbury: I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will realise that his suggestion is unworthy of him. The Labour Front Bench has been pressing for the decision on this order to be brought forward.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Does my right hon. Friend understand that all those with roots in the north of England warmly support the measures that he has announced today and those measures that the Government have already announced and implemented to help that part of the country? Does he also understand that, while there is quiet satisfaction and pleasure in and around Barrow, the order which has been placed on the basis of technical excellence and value for money will help that part of Cumbria where many of my constituents work? There are massive and continuing problems in Barrow as a result of the end of the cold war and the collapse of communism and the rundown in submarine building. My right hon. Friend will need to pay attention to the continuing problems in Barrow in the months ahead.

Mr. Sainsbury: I thank my right hon. Friend for his welcome—and, indeed, that of other hon. Members—for the measures that I have announced. They will bring further practical help and job creation opportunities to the region.

My right hon. Friend is right about what he said about Barrow. I am well aware of the difficulties there, both by reason of the peripherality of the area and the rundown of jobs in the Trident building programme. I know how welcome yesterday's announcement will be in Barrow and, indeed, on the Clyde.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The Minister has just lectured the House on the recognition of achievement. Perhaps he will tell us where, in his announcement today, there is a recognition of the achievements of the directors and work force of Swan Hunter shipyard since privatisation in 1986. He supported that privatisation. How have the people of Tyneside been rewarded for all their work?

Many of the things that my constituents would like me to say to the Minister would not be allowed in the House, so I simply ask him a question that the whole of Tyneside wants to be asked: is it the Government's intention that Swan Hunter should remain in existence as a shipyard? If so, what orders will go into that yard? Orders will need to be committed by the end of the week or the yard will go into receivership.

Mr. Sainsbury: I hope that there is no hon. Member who does not recognise the difficulties, the regrets and, indeed, the sorrow and bitterness that may be felt because of the long history of shipbuilding on the Tyne, especially by Swan Hunter. We owe it to the work force and management of Swan Hunter to be practical and realistic. There is excess capacity in warship building. We all know the reasons why there is a cut in defence orders not simply in the United Kingdom but worldwide. We would not be helping that management or work force if we were to suggest that orders could be conjured out of nowhere. The measures that I have announced today will provide practical help to an area which has suffered a severe blow.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that the House has heard many sad stories about yards that did not get defence orders. There was always a three or four-corner argument on who should get the latest frigate order, and so on. My firm of Vosper Thornycroft, in Southampton, which is privatised, has made great efforts. The opportunities that my right hon. Friend is showing today to this area could be something for the future because Vosper Thornycroft, after going worldwide to get orders and doing everything that it could to cut back its work force and ensure that it had a substantial order book, now valued at about £700 million, could be an example to Swan Hunter. I am sure that, with my right hon. Friend's help, this will not be a disaster story but something for the future.

Mr. Sainsbury: I certainly join my hon. Friend in congratulating Vosper's shipyard in his area on its success in building up a substantial export order book. It is another privatised yard that is expanding and taking on staff. As my hon. Friend recalled, it is inevitable that, when there are orders to be placed, the Ministry of Defence, on behalf of the taxpayer, should seek value for money. Seeking value for money inevitably means on occasion that there are losers of orders as well as winners. That is the inevitable result. It is obviously a matter of great regret for those who lose, but it is not realistic to suggest that one should simply place twice as many orders so that there are no losers.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Is the Minister aware that, far from the impression that he gave of an outdated industry, Swan Hunter is one of the most modern facilities in the world? Is he further aware that, during the term of office of the Government, companies such as Plessey and Marconi—companies at the forefront of technology—have also closed facilities at Tyneside? Having destroyed our mining industry, now destroyed our shipbuilding industry, decimated our manufacturing industry and undermined our local democracy, can he explain to the people of Tyneside, particularly in Tynemouth, why any of them should ever contemplate voting Tory again?

Mr. Sainsbury: The hon. Gentleman would do his constituents and British industry a better service if he recognised its achievements, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) did, in winning record export orders, record manufacturing output and unsurpassed increases in manufacturing productivity.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): In view of the strategic implications of losing a shipyard, will my hon. Friend discuss with the Secretary of State for Defence what scope there might be within the Royal Navy for ordering ships of a lesser specification? I am thinking particularly of those ships which are badly needed to replace our amphibious warfare ships, which are essentially ships which transport rather than fight. It would be possible to design ships which would serve their purpose with the lower specification and would serve the purpose of creating orders which are badly needed in British shipyards.

Mr. Sainsbury: I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will both have noted what my hon. Friend said. I refer him to what my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) said last week, but I can also confirm that the order that has been placed for the helicopter carrier is by no means for a ship that is gold-plated. It will be a practical vessel which will meet the requirements of the Navy for the task that it has been given.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Does the Minister understand that the great sense of anger among workers in the shipyard community and the whole of Newcastle is born out of a sense of betrayal? The Government have told workers that they believe in an industrial policy, yet it is clear that a decision has been made on defence procurement which does no more than set one industrial area against another, without regard to the regeneration of two industrial communities in the north.

Is it not time that there was much closer liaison between the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry? Is it not also time that a more long-term approach was taken to defence procurement? Does the Minister accept that an urban development corporation is wholly inadequate to deal with a situation in which 3,000 direct jobs and 6,000 or 7,000 indirect jobs are at risk? Does he not believe, as his boss used to believe, in the need for a strategic economic development body on Tyneside?

Mr. Sainsbury: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that there is the closest possible co-operation between my Department and the Ministry of Defence. The wider issues to which he referred were fully taken into account. But surely he can recognise that we were ordering not two helicopter carriers but one, and that one yard or the other, sadly, had to be the loser.

As I said earlier, I am sure that we can all appreciate the feelings of those on the losing side, but we must be realistic. That is why I have announced a package of measures that can be taken and are being taken by the Government which will genuinely help to attract employment and provide better training and relocation opportunities to the work force of Swan Hunter.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Would the order have been available to either yard if we had initiated the cuts in the defence budget advocated by either of the Opposition parties?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend makes, clearly and simply, an effective point. If the Opposition parties' proposals on defence expenditure had been followed, there would have been no order for either yard.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Does the Minister accept that his announcement today, which means the virtual closure of Swan Hunter, is a sad occasion for someone like me who served his apprenticeship as a marine fitter in that shipyard? Is he aware that, when I entered the House in March 1974 after handing in my notice at the Hawthorn Leslie shipyard, there were six yards on Tyneside building ships—the Walker naval yard, the Swan Neptune yard, Hawthorn Leslie, Clelands of Wallsend and Redheads of South Shields, as well as Swans. All the yards that I have named have closed during the past few years. The Tory Government have stood back and done nothing, while thousands of skilled shipyard workers have been thrown on the dole queue.

Is it not time that the Minister accepted that it is in Britain's national interest to retain shipbuilding on Tyneside where some of the finest ships that have ever sailed the seven seas have been built? Is not it incumbent upon him and his Government to provide work and orders to maintain shipbuilding on Tyneside?

Mr. Sainsbury: We all appreciate that the failure to win the order was a bitter blow not just to persons such as the hon. Gentlemen who are involved with that shipbuilding area but to those working at the yard and those who have worked at the yard and their families. But it is surely impractical and unrealistic to suggest that we should conjure up orders for warships which the Ministry of Defence does not want in order to keep warship building going when there is excess capacity for warship building.

Is not the hon. Gentleman aware of the scale of the reductions in shipbuilding, both merchant and warship, not just in Britain but throughout Europe and the rest of the world? There is no point in trying to prop up a yard to build ships for which there are no orders. There is point in doing what the Government have announced today, which is to provide better opportunities for attracting employment and training for the work force.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is sad for Tynesiders that the decision has gone against them, but the fact remains that had the decision gone the other way the job implications on Clydeside, and particularly in Barrow, were likely to be even worse because of the geographical nature of that area? Does he further agree that the way in which the tender was set out and won by VSEL clearly demonstrates the good value for money that the taxpayer is getting from this method of providing warships for the Royal Navy?

Mr. Sainsbury: My hon. Friend makes an important point about value for money for our defence expenditure. I fear that he is right to draw attention to the fact that, if my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement had awarded the contract to Swan Hunter, I might have been hearing much the same comments that I have heard today but from a different group of Members. That brings us back to the fact that there is not a need for two ships, but two yards were bidding and one had to be a loser.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Is the Minister aware that in the past three or four months 5,000 jobs have gone in the mining industry, that after last night's decision on fishing thousands of fishing jobs will go, and that thousands upon thousands of jobs will be lost on the closure of Swan Hunter? When will the Minister realise that he is not setting up enterprises in the north-east but closing them down? Where shall we find enterprises that will put 10,000 people back to work? When will the Minister get off his backside and get something done in the north-east?

Mr. Sainsbury: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will pay tribute to the excellent work that has been done by all those——

Mr. Campbell: What about the miners, the fishermen and the shipyard workers?

Mr. Sainsbury: If the hon. Gentleman will pause for a moment, I was saying that I hope that he will recognise the excellent work that has been done by all those people on Tyneside in the local authorities, by business men in the chamber of commerce, and by the training and enterprise council. In the urban development corporation, 10,000 jobs have been created, jobs have been created in the enterprise agencies and we have achieved success in the measures that we have taken in Sunderland. Let us look forward and try to build on the industries of the future, not try to prop up the past.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton): I have never heard a Minister so complacent in all my time in the House. I am sure that the House will regret the fact that a great shipbuilding industry is going, not temporarily but for good, and when there is a dire need for the British merchant fleet to be modernised and replaced. When we lose the capacity for building ships at Swan Hunter on Tyneside, any orders will go to foreign countries, to our competitors.

The Minister's talk about enterprise zones is slightly flawed and hollow. Swan Hunter has the ability to make good quality ships that our merchant fleet could use, and we should be using it.

Mr. Sainsbury: Again, I have to say that, if we are to provide practical help, we must recognise that there is a great excess capacity of shipbuilding in the world, not just warship building but merchant ship building. To be realistic, it was most unlikely that Swan Hunter would be able to win merchant ship orders against the competition that is around, even were there such orders waiting to be placed. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman knows that there are no such orders. That is why I emphasise again that the measures that we have announced are devoted to attracting new industries and to providing premises for those new industries, which will create employment in the vehicle, pharmaceutical and electronics industries, for which there is a promising future and where great success has already been achieved on Tyneside.

Scottish Water Services

4 pm

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I draw to your attention Government press briefings and press reports of a major policy statement about the privatisation of Scottish water services that is being made in Edinburgh today? Will you repeat your view that Government policy statements should be made in this House, especially when they concern services that affect every family in Scotland and more that 6,000 jobs?

Madam Speaker: If a statement of the nature of which the hon. Gentleman speaks has been made, of course I deprecate it. I am always anxious that information should be made available to this House in the first instance. As the hon. Gentleman says, it seems at present to be speculation. He should really have the facts before he raises such a point of order with me.

Mr. Welsh: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I have the press release here, which is headed.

"Tories' Water U-turn—Sell-off Plan Dumped."

It quotes a speech by a Government——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am not arguing with the hon. Gentleman, but what he is holding up appears to be a press report, not a press release.

Voluntary Personal Security Cards

4.1 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the introduction of a system of voluntary personal security cards; and for connected purposes.

Every Member of Parliament already enjoys the protection of his own personal security card. I hope that that principle can be extended throughout the country. There is much talk at the moment in all quarters about the fact that the Government should listen to what people are saying. I have no doubt in my mind that the Government are doing that already, but I do not believe that it is either good or sensible government automatically to develop policy, regardless of whether or not there is a strong belief in what people are saying. After all, Governments are elected on the basis of legislative proposals and a set of deeply held beliefs. I hope that on this occasion the Government will listen carefully to what both I and other law-abiding citizens are saying on this issue. If the Government agree, I very much hope that they will support the scheme.

One of the planks of the party to which I have always belonged is free choice, but that has never meant the freedom to choose which law to obey and which law to break. Both I, and many other citizens of this country, are appalled by the general level of criminality. The laws that we make in this place must be obeyed, but at the moment it seems to me, and to many other people, that the civil liberties of law-abiding citizens are fast being eroded. Even now, over 90 per cent. of the population are law-abiding. The country is therefore crying out for action to halt the millions of crimes that are being committed, which are costing the country an enormous amount of money.

Nothing, and no one, forces a person to break the law. It is very much a matter of individual responsibility or, should I say, lack of responsibility. That is why I believe that people should be allowed voluntarily to obtain a personal security card.

The Bill accepts in essence the recommendation that the Home Affairs Select Committee made in July 1990, when such a voluntary scheme was recommended to the Home Office. I am well aware of the arguments that are advanced against a compulsory scheme and I understand entirely the outrage that there would be if a law was passed, for instance, to make it an offence not to carry such a card. However, many parts of our lives in modern society require us to prove identity, so what could be more attractive to citizens than for them to take full advantage of the technology that is now available and to obtain voluntarily a personal security card?

The card could be used, for instance, to satisfy shopkeepers about identity when cashing cheques, or by landlords when querying drinkers' ages. It could be used for banking purposes or for recording information about organ donor status. It could also be used as a voluntary identification document to facilitate travel within the European Community and could become a model for a Community-wide card.

I have no doubt that a voluntary personal security card would help to combat fraud, illegal immigration and terrorism. The police would not have the powers to demand production of the card, and the concerns that have been expressed about oppressive demands on minorities would not, I believe, arise. Nevertheless, when people are stopped by enforcement authorities for various reasons, they might see the advantage of holding a card to prove their identity.

Proper safeguards would be necessary to ensure data privacy and the Data Protection Registrar, the many other agencies and the associated authorities would need to be involved in the process. Citizens would have the right to have independent access to data contained on their cards and to challenge its accuracy.

I have complete confidence that many companies throughout the United Kingdom have the skill and sufficient technological imagination to produce a machine-readable security card at a very reasonable cost and I am sure that people would not mind purchasing them for a small price. My goodness, the general public pay enough money through the public purse to try to control the level of criminality.

Like the Home Affairs Select Committee, I believe that personal security cards, which use modern technology to incorporate information about the holder, could be a positive enhancement of liberty. Nothing could be more invasive than the exposure of someone's private credit card transactions, yet it has never been suggested on civil liberty grounds that we should abolish credit cards as a result of the exposure of people's lending limits.

British citizens are already well used to carrying cards and to identifying themselves before cashing cheques or borrowing library books, let alone crossing national boundaries. One card—a smart card—which allowed all that to be done and which contained data on the holder's medical records in case of emergency and for banking purposes would be of enormous benefit.

I believe that now is precisely the time to react positively to the widespread and deeply felt concern among the general public about the level of criminality. The voluntary scheme that I am proposing has many benefits for the individual and for the state. I am not aware of any objection to the principles and laws behind registering someone's birth or death. Why, then, can we not allow the period between those two points to be clearly identified? I hope that the Bill will start the necessary process towards the implementation of a scheme that could be another weapon in the serious war against crime in which we all, as citizens, have a part to play.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Amess, Mr. Jacques Arnold, Mr. David Ashby, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mr. James Hill, Lady Olga Maitland, Dame Jill Knight, Sir John Hunt, Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman, Mrs. Angela Knight, Mr. Ralph Howell and Sir John Wheeler.

Voluntary Personal Security Cards

Mr. David Amess accordingly presented a Bill to provide for the introduction of a system of voluntary personal security cards; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 2 July, and to be printed. [Bill 196.]

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

Considered in Committee [Progress, 11 May]
[MR. MICHAEL MORRIS in the Chair]

Clause 52

PERSONAL AND MARRIED COUPLE'S ALLOWANCES

4.11 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I beg to move amendment No. 48, in clause 52, page 30, line 34, leave out 'sections 257 and' and insert 'Section'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Michael Morris): With this, it will be convenient also to discuss the following amendments:

No. 49, in page 30, line 34, leave out 'personal and'.

No. 50, in page 30, line 35, leave out 'allowances' and insert 'allowance'.

No. 51, in page 30, line 35, leave out 'amounts' and insert 'amount'.

No. 12, in page 30, line 37, after '1993-94', insert 'in respect of the married couple's allowance only'.

No. 52, in page 30, line 38, after '1993-94', insert 'so far as relates to section 257A of that Act.'.

No. 13, in page 30, line 38, at end add 'in respect of the married couple's allowance only'.

Mr. Brown: The amendments tabled by the Labour party would have the same effect as those tabled by the Liberal Democrats—although I see that no Liberal Democrat is here to speak to those, so it would probably be for the convenience of the Committee if I spoke to their amendments as well as ours. Fortunately, the amendments have been grouped together.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Where are they?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who I understand will not be with us in the Standing Committee—that is a source of enormous regret to the Opposition—asks me to explain where the representative of the Liberal Democrats is. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) has just entered the Chamber, I can say, "There he is," or, "He is there, he is there," as the Prime Minister would point out in that inimitable style that he has made his own.

The other inimitable element of style that the Prime Minister has made his own is, of course, concealed tax increases, which we are discussing today. In case anybody has overlooked it—I am sure that no one in the Chamber has—I must explain that what is before the House is a massive increase, but a back-door increase, in direct taxation. [Interruption.] The Financial Secretary to the Treasury giggles at that idea. I do not know whether he giggles nervously or out of sheer physical exhaustion; after all, he has had to deal with the Maastricht legislation as well as with the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

I should be a great deal more sympathetic to the Government's concealed tax increases if some of them were being spent on procuring the landing platform helicopter vessel from Swan Hunter. I understand that the Treasury is taking the credit for the fact that the order has gone to Barrow-in-Furness rather than to Swan Hunter. If that is an opening shot in the negotiations, it is not a worthy one.

The tax increases before us are of substantial significance. The changes that the Budget invites us to make in personal allowances are designed, as the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) will be well aware, to bring in an extra £2·5 billion for the Exchequer in 1994-95 and an extra £2·7 billion in the following year. Those are substantial sums.

That Tory trick has been tried before. In 1981, the then Chancellor froze all the allowances and gained an extra £2 billion. What I think will anger the electorate—last week's election results show the extent of public anger with the Conservative party—is not just the breaking of pre-election pledges about tax increases but also the sneaky way in which the Chancellor has gone about the increases. It is clear that Treasury files have been scoured for tried and tested ways of raising taxes that at least the Chancellor hopes the taxpayers will not notice. Clearly, however, they have noticed.

Let us take the obvious example. Although an increase of a penny in the pound in income tax would have been more progressive than a 1 per cent. increase in employees' national insurance contributions, the Chancellor chose the latter. This is not because such a move provides more help for the poor—obviously it does not—but because the Chancellor clearly believes that it does not look so much like a tax increase.

Mr. Tim Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: When I finish this point, I shall of course give way to the hon. Gentleman, who is a firm favourite of mine and of other Labour Front-Bench Treasury spokespersons.

Exactly the same sort of thinking as that to which I have just referred applies to the extension of valued added tax to domestic fuel and charities. It is pretty clear that the electorate have seen through these devices and are even more angered at the attempted deceit than at the tax increases themselves. What the Treasury team has given us are the methods of Arthur Daley, used by those who clearly regard Alan B'Stard as a role model.

I give way to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), without the obvious implication.

Mr. Smith: I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows that the principal reason for increasing national insurance contributions is that the national insurance fund is now in substantial deficit. Indeed, it will still be in substantial deficit after the increase. I imagine that the hon. Gentleman supports the contributory principle on which it is based. Contributions must be increased when outward payments are rising.

Mr. Brown: It would have been more helpful if the hon. Gentleman had reminded us which party had scrapped the Treasury's contribution to the national insurance fund. If his case is based on hypothecation, why, a few years ago, did not the Government think that that was a very strong argument? The Standing Committee will miss the hon. Gentleman, as he brings to the arguments a quality that one does not necessarily find in all his hon. Colleagues. In making that comment, I do not intend to cast aspersions.

I should like to move on to the real topic of this debate—not just tax rises, but sneaky tax rises. Taken together, the Government's changes in allowances and the change to the lower rate band, which, in fairness, has also to be considered, will result in a net gain to the Exchequer of £2·7 billion by 1995-96. Of course this is significant. We should discuss the lower rate band as a reform, as a means of giving back to taxpayers more of their own money, alongside the freezing of the personal allowances, which is a means of taking from taxpayers more of their own money.

Let me state the brutal arithmetic. In 1995-96, the Chancellor will gain about £96 million from freezing all the personal tax thresholds, and another £1,170 million through further restriction of the married couple's allowance. On the last point, hon. Members will recall how thoroughly the Labour party was denounced during the 1987 general election campaign for proposing to do something similar. The present Prime Minister denounced our proposals, and then adopted them. To offset the substantial inflows to the Exchequer that I have just described, it is right to consider the cost of about £850 million to which it is said the lower rate band will give rise in the same financial year. That money goes back to the taxpayer.

However, the changes to mortgage tax relief gain an extra £870 million for the Exchequer. Here again, the Chancellor probably hopes that people will not notice or will not mind so much, as mortgage interest rates have come down following his spectacular policy of leaving the ERM and reducing interest rates. However, long-term interest rates are rising, and are certainly higher than short-term rates. We all know what that probably means for the future, although I am not sure that I agree with the Chancellor that letters to him urging rises in interest rates are a lead indicator.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): As one of the more sensible members of his party, does not the hon. Gentleman think that it is sensible for the Government to raise revenue to reduce a deficit which has been caused by a recession, not just in the United Kingdom, but worldwide? As he has raised the issue of the long-term rate of interest, surely he recognises that, by reducing the deficit, we will secure a better future, with a reduced long-term rate of interest. Does he not feel, in the national interest, that raising additional revenue in that way is good?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman certainly knows how to launch a wounding attack. Being described as one of the more sensible members of the Opposition Front Bench by the hon. Gentleman is designed to do me enormous damage on Tyneside, or at least among those who follow the debates in Committee on the Finance Bill.

The hon. Gentleman has obviously been following my speeches, including my reply to the Second Reading debate and my earlier speech on economic affairs, when I drew attention to the deficit and to the dangers inherent in it. The deficit is a problem. It would be a problem for us in government, as it is for the Government, but let us not forget how it came about. It was the Government who said before the general election that it was safe to reduce taxes and who say that recovery is happening, but yet have had to reduce, rather than increase, their growth forecasts.

Above all, it was the Government who in 1988 said that it was right to cut the top rate of income tax. The Labour party voted against that, after a huge fight about it during the passage of the legislation that year. I think that the hon. Gentleman served on the Standing Committee, so he will recall the events with some affection. It would be better if he showed sorrow and repentance, although those emotions and characteristics are not normally associated with him.

Moving to the Chancellor's tax hike, obviously he thinks that he can slip through this substantial tax increase —clearly that is what it is—without people noticing or objecting. He has allied to the changes on mortgage tax relief changes to car tax allowances, which will bring in an extra £370 million in 1995-96, and changes to the tax treatment of relocation expenses, which we will examine in detail in Committee, which will bring in an extra £206 million, not an insignificant amount.

When we add the gains from freezing all the tax thresholds and eroding personal allowances, and deduct the much smaller cost of the lower rate band, we arrive at a net gain to the Exchequer for the financial year 1995-96 of £2·7 billion. Expressed as a proportion of all revenues for the Government, that is an increase of 4 per cent. It is significant because of the way it is constructed. Particularly seriously for the Opposition, it is significant because it is also regressive.

The very poorest are not affected. One fifth of all adults do not pay income tax, even at the 20 per cent. rate, because they are too poor. They way to target help on the poorest is not through the tax system but through the social security system. However, I suspect that the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary were even less receptive to that point than usual when they came to construct this year's Budget. Of course, on past form it is not a point that one would expect the Secretary of State for Social Security to have raised or pressed with them.

The Institute for Fiscal Studies, in its green budget for this year, draws attention to the gains and losses from restricting allowances and from expanding the reduced rate band. For its calculation, it used a figure of £1,000 rather than the Chancellor's £500—the broad flow gives a similar distributional effect. The institute's work shows that the very poorest are not affected, because they are too poor to be affected by any change in the construction of the tax allowance system. The next poorest—those in the third, fourth and fifth deciles, who have below ordinary or medium means—are adversely affected by the change. People in the sixth, seventh, eighth and ninth gain slightly from the change, and the wealthiest 10 per cent. are also slightly adversely affected because they come into a higher rate band.

We are concerned, of course, about the regressive effect of the change—particularly the way in which it will impact upon those who are not the poorest in our society, but next to them. They are typically persons in work but earning £100 a week or less. The freezing of allowances and the expanding of the lower rate must cumulatively have a regressive effect.

Single people with incomes of £3,535 up to a level of £5,535 are £18 worse off because of the changes, but everyone with an income of less than £5,895 must be worse off with the lower rate band than they would have been with the indexation of personal allowances.

Because of this, the parliamentary Labour party has tabled an amendment whose intention is to restore allowances. By this means, we wish to help those in our society who are on poor wages. We object very strongly to the dishonesty of the construction of the Government's tax policies. We also object very strongly to the use of the lower rate band and the freezing of allowances to make changes which are demonstrably regressive.

Mr. Tim Smith: It is a matter of considerable regret to me that I shall not be serving on the Finance Bill Standing Committee and shall not have the opportunity of hearing the entertaining words of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown).

It is worth recalling the background to any debate on the indexation of personal allowances, especially as the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) is present in the Chamber. Hon. Members will recall that in the 1970s there was no obligation on the Government of the day to index personal allowances. When inflation reached 25 per cent., in 1975, there was pressure, not only from the Opposition of the day but also from the hon. Member for Perry Barr and his colleague who is now the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise), to change the law.

This was successful, and that change has been one of the most important and radical changes to tax law in the last 20 years. It is now incumbent on the House, if it does not want to index, to make a positive decision in that sense. The change was more important in those days, the late 1970s, when inflation was running at an average of about 15 per cent. per annum, than it is today. None the less, it is important even today.

A decision not to index these allowances should not be taken lightly. I would be the first to recognise that, if one does not index allowances, one is increasing the tax burden on those people on the lowest incomes. That was precisely the concern of the hon. Member for Perry Barr when he pursued this issue so assiduously, and ultimately so successfully, in the late 1970s. I am very glad that at that time the Conservative Opposition supported him in that endeavour, because it was a very important change.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I agree with what my hon. Friend is saying, and he is making an important point. I wonder whether he is aware of the statistical background against which this argument is taking place. Over the five years between 1974 and 1979, the Labour party cut the real value of the single person's allowance by 21 per cent. In the period since we have been in office, including this year's proposals, the single person's allowance has risen by 25 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the Committee of the background to the decision, but I was not surprised at what he had to say.

The concern of hon. Members at that time was not only that there had been substantial increases in tax rates in the Budget of March 1974—when Denis Healey had increased the standard rate of income tax from 30 per cent. to 33 per cent.—and in the following year's Budget of March 1975, when the standard rate was increased again from 33 per cent. to 35 per cent. In addition, we had 25 per cent. inflation and no indexation of tax allowances. As a result, not only was there a massive increase in the tax burden for every income tax payer, but his bore down particularly heavily on people on low incomes. That was the concern of the hon. Member for Perry Barr. By that time, much of the damage had been done, because changes were not made until the Finance Act 1977.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): It was 14 June 1977.

4.30 pm

Mr. Smith: It was 14 June, 1977. The hon. Gentleman has that date etched on his memory—rather as I do 28 April 1977 when, partly as a consequence of the huge changes in taxation, I was elected to the House for the first time. I remember the miners of Ashfield showing me their pay slips and telling me of the massive increase in the tax burden they had suffered under Denis Healey, the most unpopular Chancellor ever in Britain. We will never again have such an unpopular Chancellor because of such a massive increase in the tax burden.

Mr. Rooker: Will the hon. Gentleman give us a forecast of when he thinks the tax burden will once again be reduced to the level that it was left by Denis Healey?

Mr. Smith: At that time, people were concerned about direct taxation. Funnily enough, and it is a rather strange thing, most people have a good idea how much tax they pay—for example, in local taxation. My post suggests that people have a pretty good idea of how much council tax they pay. It is a tax with a high profile, as it should be. So is income tax. People get a pay slip every week and they can see how much income tax and national insurance is being deducted. However, if the average person in a pub was asked how much tax he had just paid on a round of drinks, fortunately, he would probably have no idea.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): Fortunately.

Mr. Smith: It is extremely fortunate, and it is true for all Governments.

There is no doubt that some ways of raising tax are less painful than others, simply because they have a lower profile. Some taxes have the advantage of being buoyant, some do not. There are many different considerations when one is deciding on the most sensible tax structure, but all those factors need to be taken into account.

At that time, people were concerned about direct taxation, and they are still concerned. They are concerned principally, but not exclusively, about tax rates, but they are also concerned about tax allowances and the point at which their income starts to be taxed. The minimum amount that one can earn before one has to pay tax is an important question, and we are considering it this afternoon. It is not a decision to be taken lightly to decline to increase the tax thresholds. One needs to give that serious consideration, and it is precisely what we are doing in the debate.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East referred to the 1981 Budget. I am probably right in saying that it was the last occasion on which such a decision was taken. That may not be so, but it certainly involved a large increase in taxation. He referred to a figure of £2 billion, and I believe that was the figure by which taxes were increased in 1981.

Although the circumstances were not the same in 1981, they were similar in some ways. There is no doubt that the Budget in 1981 was extremely unpopular—of course it was; no one likes having their taxes increased, it is as simple as that—but it was also a very courageous Budget, which established the foundations for economic recovery throughout the 1980s, because it tackled the problem of the public sector borrowing requirement. The Chancellor,

[Mr. Smith]

Lord Howe—Sir Geoffrey Howe, as he then was—made a clear commitment to sound finances on the part of the Conservative Government.

We had to deal with the difficult problem of the PSBR, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has done the same this year. This, too, is not a popular Budget, and we do not have to look far to see why. If we look at page 6 of the Red Book, we find that taxes are to rise by nearly £500 million in the current financial year, by more than £6·5 billion next year and by more than £10 billion the year after. Of course such measures are never likely to be popular.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: It would help my understanding of these matters if the hon. Gentleman could explain why —if the Government were as committed as he said to sound finances in 1981—the situation has since deteriorated to such an extent that it is necessary to have tax rises to reaffirm the same commitment that was given then? What has happened over the last 10, 11 or 12 years? Why have matters deteriorated in such a way that we need to hear the same speech?

Mr. Smith: I do not want to leap about like a grasshopper in what is a carefully prepared and thought out discourse. I will come to why we now face such a large PSBR, to which the hon. Gentleman referred in his speech.

The decision not to index personal allowances must be seen in the broader context of the important need to raise revenue to tackle the PSBR. The point that I was making is that Sir Geoffrey Howe in his 1981 budget did exactly that. It was extremely unpopular at the time, but it established a basis for economic recovery throughout the 1980s. It will not be long before we think the same about the 1993 Budget.

Mr. David Shaw: My hon. Friend says that this is not a popular Budget. Will he consider that very carefully? It has been popular with overseas holders of sterling, who have seen that the pound is worth supporting and that the Government have been running the finances well; it has been popular with overseas purchasers of gilts; the Government's borrowing requirement has been well met by support from overseas purchasers; it has been popular with business men, who feel that it is the basis on which recovery can be built; it is clearly popular with overseas investors, who still intend, as far as one can see, to locate their businesses here; it is clearly popular with the people who can help us create jobs in this country. Perhaps my hon. Friend will consider that it is a popular Budget with all the people who count, but what we must do is explain it to the people better——

The Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not being popular with the Chair. We are supposed to be discussing personal and married couples' allowances.

Mr. Shaw: I understand your point, Mr. Morris, but if I can make the key point——

The Chairman: Order. No.

Mr. Smith: I have to say that I was taking a rather narrow view of popularity: I was referring to the voters in my constituency. I accept what my hon. Friend says—he makes an important point—because, in the long run the Budget did appeal to the people he is talking about. They too recognise that the decision not to increase the personal allowances was not an easy decision to take. It was a difficult decision, but the right decision in the circumstances. In the long run, it will have very great benefits. There are two different contexts.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The hon. Member is comparing the 1993 and 1981 Budgets, and he is saying that the latter laid the foundations for what he seems to think was a recovery in the 1980s, and that the former will do the same for the 1990s. But surely in 1981 it was unnecessary for the Government to freeze the uprating of personal allowances in line with inflation. Why then is it necessary in 1993, given that he has drawn the comparison between the two Budgets?

Mr. Smith: I think that I am right in saying that the Government did exactly that in 1981. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) also confirmed that that was the case. That is why I was drawing a parallel with 1981. I was saying that on both occasions difficult decisions had to be made in order to provide a sound basis for economic recovery.

I want briefly to deal with a point raised by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. He asked why the Government did not increase the standard rate of income tax, rather than, for example, increasing national insurance contributions. It is an important point that needs to be addressed. I suggested to him that it was because the national insurance fund is a separate fund. Some people tend to trivialise the matter and say that it is of no consequence, but I attach importance to this and to the contributory principle, for many reasons that it would be wrong to go into in the present debate. I accept what the hon. Member says about the Treasury supplement. I would like to see us get back to a national insurance fund which is properly funded.

What I wanted to say about the decision not to index the tax allowances was that it needed to be looked at in two contexts. The first is that of increasing taxes overall. That is what will happen. I have already quoted the figures to the Committee. It is one of a number of different measures, some of which could be described as more progressive than others. We could have some debate about which taxpayers will be hit hardest by this. I think that the figures that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East quoted earlier, from the Institute for Fiscal Studies, were prepared before the Budget. At least, it sounded like it to me, because he referred to an increase in the 20 per cent. band of £1,000 whereas, as I understand it, the 20 per cent. band will be increased by only £500.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: That is what I said.

Mr. Smith: Yes, the hon. Gentleman made that point, but I was suggesting that, as the figures from which he was quoting referred to £1,000, they must have been prepared before the Budget, or, if they were prepared after the Budget, they must have been prepared by someone who had not read the Budget properly.

Mr. Brown rose——

Mr. Smith: Whichever it was, they were not very helpful figures, because they did not refer to what had actually happened.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that I said that I was quoting from the IFS's green budget, which was prepared in advance of the Budget. It is a document with which he is perfectly familiar. The graph on the distributional effect was prepared on the basis of £1,000, and I acknowledged that the band had been expanded by only £500. But it does not affect the broad distributional effect, the fact that the poorest neither gain nor lose because they do not pay tax, the next poorest lose and the people who are slightly better off may gain a little, but not a lot.

Mr. Smith rose——

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend might like also to ruminate on the fact that, although the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East quoted from an IFS report on what might happen on the basis of its green budget, he very noticeably did not quote from the IFS analysis of what will happen as a consequence of the Government's actual Budget. It has analysed the distributional effect of the Budget, and the evidence that it has produced shows almost precisely the same tax take all the way up the income scale. Decile by decile, the effect of the Budget is the same, according to the IFS.

Mr. Smith: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for confirming what I was about to say, which was that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East had, first of all, quoted from a document prepared before the Budget and, secondly, had looked at two measures in isolation rather than looking at all the Budget measures together.

Let me take one example, the taxation of company cars. We all know that the amount of benefit in kind which is subject to taxation if one has a company car has been increased year by year for the past five years or so, and has now reached the point—I fully support this, I may say—at which taxpayers are now required to pay tax on the full economic benefit of having a car. We also know that most people who drive company cars are on higher salaries, and we must take account of that in assessing the overall distributional effects of the Budget.

I am therefore most grateful to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary for confirming what I believe—that it is important to look at all these cases together, although we are just debating the one change at the moment, the decision not to index tax thresholds. If we do that, we find that the effect is reasonably fair for everyone. We must all bear a bit of pain, and all income tax payers must pay a bit more.

One of the more important of the difficult decisions made by the Government to raise more revenue was not to increase the tax rate. Some people have said that it would have been more straightforward to do so, and they have asked why the standard rate or the higher rate of income tax was not increased. I believe that it would have been a mistake to do so.

To increase either of the tax rates would have been a major disincentive for people, a step backwards. What my hon. Friends at the Treasury have done is to take another major step forward to a tax rate of 20p in the pound. That is very good news indeed. It is our ultimate objective, and we have taken another small but important step towards it in this Budget. In the long run, it will be a very popular decision. At the time of last year's Budget, the decision was derided by some. They said that the Chancellor had got it wrong, but only a few weeks later, the electorate decided that the Chancellor had got it right. It was the right decision to introduce a 20p tax band. It was a decision that I supported, and I very much welcome the present decision to increase the tax band.

I want to have a look not just at the need to fund the public sector borrowing requirement, although I feel that it is incumbent on Opposition Members, if they object to every tax increase, to say where they would get the money from. It was noticable in Monday's debate that the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) consistently refused to say how a Labour Government would increase taxes. That is not a responsible action. With a large PSBR, some decisions to increase taxes are necessary, and we should be told what the Labour party's alternatives are. But I do not suppose that we will hear anything about that in this debate. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Gentleman wish to say something? If so, it is normal practice here to stand up.

Mr. George Howarth: (Knowsley, North): If the hon. Gentleman is trying to tempt my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham into responding, perhaps he could say how he thinks the Chancellor should fund the PSBR next year. If he cannot do so—and I suspect that the Chancellor cannot—how can he expect my hon. Friend to say how she would do it in two or three years' time?

Mr. Smith: There are published proposals that take us through to March, 1996, three years away. They are projections, but what else could they possibly be? They cannot be statements of faith.

I will tell the hon. Gentleman something. The Treasury has been widely criticised for failing to forecast what the PSBR is likely to be, but I refer the hon. Gentleman to a table in the Red Book—which I will probably be unable to find now because of the size of the Red Book and the fact that I need to keep on talking while I look for it. Because we now have a panel of independent advisers, somewhere in the Red Book—my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary may be able to find it for me—is a very interesting table which shows that each of the independent forecasters has made a separate forecast for the PSBR, and that in 1995-96 the discrepancy, if I remember rightly, is between £20 billion and £50 billion.

That demonstrates the difficulty of forecasting a figure which is itself the difference between two very large figures. It is like trying to forecast the balance of payments. So what the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), who keeps intervening from a sedentary position, should appreciate is that forecasting is an extremely inexact science.

While the Treasury has got it wrong, so has every other economic forecaster. The table, which I now learn from my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is on page 54 of the Red Book, shows that Mr. Wynne Godley has the highest forecast of PSBR, at £60 billion, in 1994-95. It is only next year that we are talking about, less than a year away. Mr. Godley is forecasting £60 billion, whereas Mr. Congdon is forecasting £38 billion, a difference of £22 billion in the forecast of the PSBR for next year. That illustrates the difficulty in forecasting the PSBR.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North-East): Would the hon. Gentleman care to make a few comments on the forecast immediately before the last election of tax decreases year on year, made by the Chancellor—and the Prime Minister, I think?

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): That was not a forecast; it was a promise.

Mr. Smith: Unfortunately, I do not have last year's Red Book with me, so I cannot say what tax decreases were forecast. But, of course, the main tax decrease that was proposed in last year's Budget was the introduction of the innovative 20p tax band to which I have already referred, which was opposed by Opposition Members but was widely supported by the electorate only a month later in a general election.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about the 20p or 20 per cent. tax band, but does he not agree that that was offset last year and this year—last year by the increases in VAT and this year by the proposed increases in VAT?

Mr. Smith: I have already said that increases in taxes are unpopular, but Governments have to make unpopular decisions sometimes, in the national interest. That was an unpopular decision that will form the basis for sound economic recovery.

Mr. David Shaw: My hon. Friend is talking to an amendment on revenue raising and the issue whether we should be raising additional revenue. He drew attention to the fact that the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), refused to detail how alternatively she would raise additional revenue. Does he conclude that, if she proposes to keep the PSBR the same, she now really wants to reduce public expenditure? Is that not a major change for the hon. Lady and the Labour party? Does the Labour party now want to cut public expenditure significantly, if it will not raise additional revenue?

Mr. Smith: I am very sorry to disillusion my hon. Friend, but I recall that, in her speech on Monday, the hon. Lady's solution to the PSBR was to cut taxes and increase spending. She said "Let's have more spending on education and training, and let's have more investment allowances for companies." That means lower business taxes and higher public spending. I am only a simple accountant, but if one cuts taxes and increases spending, I think I am right in saying that one adds to the PSBR. So I do not think that the hon. Lady's solution is the right one.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) is entirely right. There are only two possibilities: one has either to increase taxes or to cut public spending. Those are both difficult and unpopular decisions that Governments have to take.

The second yardstick by which this matter should be considered is the decision in the Budget to devote what help was available to business ensuring that the tax cuts that could be made went to business. That was the right balance, I think, at the present point in the economic cycle.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dover said, as a result of that, this Budget was widely welcomed by business. If we look at the table on page 6 of the Red Book, we can see why. The decision not to increase business rates by more than indexation will cost the Exchequer £370 million this year, but that decision has been widely welcomed by business, as has the decision debated last night to improve VAT relief on bad debts. That will cost £150 million in the current year, but it will bring immediate relief to many companies that have cash flow difficulties.

There is an important balance here between business taxes and personal taxes. I believe that the Government have that balance right, too, so it was right in the Budget to make some increases in personal taxation, and that is why I support the clause.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The trouble with the small, but important, steps towards the 20p band to which the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred is that individually they often have the effect of not helping the poorest and lowest earners. That is a point to which I shall return in a moment. To be in favour of a general objective is not necessarily the same as supporting proceeding to it by steps which do not in themselves help the people it is supposed to help.

We have on the Order Paper two amendments with the same objective as the amendments that the Labour party has put forward today. They would stop the Government from failing to increase the personal tax allowance, but continue the freezing of the married couple's allowance. By a neat bit of gazumping, the Labour party in the course of the past three days put down more amendments, thus widening involvement in this debate.

The freezing of the personal income tax allowance brings more people into tax. I remember speech after speech by Chancellor after Chancellor and Financial Secretary after Financial Secretary saying how many people the Government were taking out of tax. If one freezes personal income tax allowances, one brings more people into tax, and they are by definition people at the lowest levels of income.

The married couple's allowance is not in the same category. Some people regard it as an anomaly because it is not related to whether there are children in the family. Freezing it seems to have become quite a common practice and to enjoy reasonably widespread support, but we would support that only so long as child benefit continues to be uprated annually, at least by the rate of inflation.

The Government are selling their 20p tax rate as if it is helping those on low incomes and is in some way a better measure than indexing the tax allowance. That is patent nonsense. The small steps taken towards the 20p tax rate, such as the one taken in this Budget, are not a significant way of helping those on the lowest incomes. It is, indeed, a kind of deception of the British people.

If steps to the 20p rate are paid for by not indexing the basic rate, one hurts the people the policy is supposed to assist. Every person with income above £3,445 will lose £18 a year, because the personal allowance should have been uprated by 2·6 per cent.—using the December 1992 RPI—to £3,535, which is £90 higher, and since they would have paid tax at 20p on that £90, the loss is £18.

Instead of uprating the allowance, the Chancellor has widened the 20p band, but this applies only to people with incomes above £5,445, so the income tax deduction from the new wider 20p band begins to offset the tax increase from not indexing only for people who have annual incomes above £5,445. It is only at incomes above £5,805 that the income tax cut from the wider band offsets the increase from not indexing the allowance, so from the point of view of those on the lowest incomes it is a poor bargain; they would have been much better off if the tax allowance had been indexed. The Chancellor continues to boast that the extension of the 20p rate is assisting the poorest in society, but in fact it does not have that effect.

The Budget shows the real reason why the 20p band method appeals: it can bring in more revenue by sleight of hand than it costs. The cost of extending the 20p rate by £1,000 will be £710 million in 1994-95 while the revenue raised from restricting mortgage tax relief to 20p in 1994-95 will be £820 million. The revenue raised from restricting the married couple's allowance to 20p in 1994-95 will be £910 million while the revenue raised from restricting the taxation of dividends to 20p will eventually be nearly £1 billion in a full year. So the gain to the Exchequer is larger than the cost. One begins to smell a rat when one sees that happening; one discovers that it is not a measure to help the lowest paid and it is also a revenue-raising measure.

The Chancellor, nearer the next election, will announce that he is widening the 20p band yet again. I use the word "Chancellor" in the way in which the Prime Minister now uses it, to denote whoever happens to hold that office. I say that advisedly because I have been passed a note saying that the Chancellor, speaking elsewhere, is announcing at this very moment that he does, after all, have some regrets. I have no information about which matters he regrets—we shall discover that on another occasion.

When his successor, whoever that may be, announces that he is widening the 20p band again to give millions of people a tax cut, will he point out that that 20p band has cost people money? The numbers will work out in favour of what the Chancellor claims to be his policy only if he fully replaces the 25p rate by the 20p rate. Given the PSBR forecast, there cannot be any serious possibility of that happening.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred to the basic decision in the Budget not to increase the standard rate, but instead to use the national insurance contribution as the means of raising the equivalent of a penny, or somewhat less than a penny, on the standard rate of income tax. The hon. Gentleman justified that by reference to the national insurance fund and to the fact that the insurance fund will be in deficit if that is not done. But it will still be in deficit even if that is done. This action is not a balancing act or an actuarial balancing of a contributory national insurance fund, but the Government raising a penny on income tax without breaching the doctrinal objection to raising a penny on income tax which their election commitments represent.

As the Government have broken so many of their other election commitments in the tax area, I think that we, as Opposition parties, could now absolve them from any further commitment or responsibility at all. Nobody believes that the Government are bound by any of those promises any more, so they are entitled to start assessing what might be good for the country as opposed to which of their promises they are prepared to break and which they are not prepared to break.

If the Government are to raise the equivalent of a penny on the standard rate, they should do it by the standard rate system and not by a system which fails to tax higher levels of income, fails to tax benefits and perks and fails to tax investment income. That is not a sensible route to take.

Mr. Tim Smith: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that it is Liberal Democrat policy to increase the standard rate of income tax?

Mr. Beith: We are in a rather different position from that of the hon. Gentleman's party. At the general election, we told people that in some circumstances we would raise the standard rate of income tax, and we defined those circumstances. The hon. Gentleman, who said that he would never raise the standard rate, can hardly criticise me when he now represents and appears to support the actions of a Government who have done so, and who have done it through the national insurance route and have used a quite spurious argument for doing so.

Mr. Dorrell: Would the right hon. Gentleman make it clear that he is distinguishing his position from that of the Labour party by saying that he is still bound by the commitments that he gave to the electorate at the general election?

Mr. Beith: That is an odd question from a member of the Government: I cannot fathom its intricacies, particularly in reference to the Labour party. I shall seek to uphold the policies and ideas that we put forward at the election. I hope that the Conservatives, like most political parties, will have the sense to notice if they are occasionally wrong. The Chancellor has announced that he now has some regrets, but so far I see no reason to change any of the policies that we advanced at the election.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The right hon. Gentleman will remember that, just weeks before the general election, the Conservatives were accusing the Labour party of proposing a £36 billion PSBR. Yet the Conservatives are now introducing proposals similar to those advanced by the right hon. Gentleman. After one year of this Conservative Government, the country is in an economic mess. I am sure that if we had a good look at the books any one of us could do a better job than the Government are doing.

Mr. Beith: It is nice to have such robust help in Committee. The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point.

I wanted to argue the merits of being straight about using the standard rate rather than disguising standard rate increases through national insurance increases which do not bear fairly on people and do not raise so much revenue. The reason for that is that they do not apply to levels of income above £420 per week, they do not apply to benefits and perks, and they do not apply to investment incomes. We have proposed ways in which we could move from the present system to the wholesale amalgamation of national insurance with the income tax system. If the Government propose to add to the tax take, they should at least do so by using the standard rate income tax system.

There are huge costs to the Government and even greater costs to business from our persistence in running the two systems side by side. I do not share the belief of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield that we can somehow resurrect the contributory system which, in effect, has been destroyed. There is no actuarial balance in the fund; it is all a myth. The hon. Gentleman knows that perfectly well; otherwise, he would tell me that there was not a £2 billion deficit in the national insurance fund and that it was all covered. He knows perfectly well that it is not covered and that the fund is not in balance.

Mr. Tim Smith: Entitlements to benefits depend on contributions. That is a good thing. Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that he would sweep all that away as well?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman must also know that most of what is paid out in the form of benefits is not based on contribution entitlements. The contribution side now plays a small part. The hon. Gentleman should reflect sometimes on the extraordinary position in which people such as his constituents find themselves. As Members of Parliament, we have to give them a letter which explains that their failure to make two contributions in 1956, of which they were unaware at the time, has left them unable to claim a benefit now. The whole system is creaking and groaning, and it is time for it to be replaced by one which streamlines the two measures. However, that takes us wide of the clause.

I am arguing that the Government are trying to use a variety of other devices to avoid doing what they would otherwise be doing in the circumstances. They would be saying, "We got it wrong; the economy was in far worse off a mess than we said; the PSBR is appalling and will continue to be appalling; we must raise more tax and we shall therefore raise the standard rate." That is what the Conservative Governments might have done in previous years, but they do not do it now because they have made a fetish of never raising the standard rate of income tax.

When we think about the allowances, we are bound to reflect on the strange perks and loopholes which still exist in the system. At the moment when the Government are exacting from people the extra costs of not indexing the allowance, Ministers appear still to enjoy the perk of having cars to drive them from their homes to their Departments. They still appear—I say "appear" because I get very evasive answers from Ministers—not to be paying tax on a benefit which is taxable for anyone in an equivalent position.

All sorts of mysterious perks and hidden benefits are still tucked away in the tax system. Such perks never work to the benefit of people at the lowest levels of income. Those people are hit by the full force of the pay-as-you-earn system, and if they are at the bottom of the scale they are hit far more forcefully than those at higher levels of income who do not have to bear the higher cost of national insurance contributions.

Mr. Milburn: The right hon. Gentleman says that he receives evasive replies from Ministers. I do not know whether he had an opportunity to read The Guardian this morning. The Financial Secretary is quoted there and I thought that his reply was far from evasive. He made it clear that, if he had to pay the full tax that was due on the perk, he would get up and walk.

Mr. Beith: Not only did I read the article, but there is a quotation from me in it, as the hon. Gentleman may recall. I do not remember those words being attributed directly to the Financial Secretary. A number of other interesting comments were attributed to other Ministers, or were said to have been made by unnamed Ministers.

In the course of the day, it has been drawn to my attention that, when the basis on which the concession appears to exist was introduced—it was part of a change made by Denis Healey when he was Chancellor which was intended to bring all journeys to work within the tax system—Ministers were told that it would not affect them and that it might be a good idea if they occasionally gave their civil servants a lift because that would help to emphasise the fact that the car was for business use and not a perk.

Mr. Tim Smith: Did Denis Healey say that?

Mr. Beith: I do not know who gave the advice, but I believe that such advice was given.

The clause and the amendments relate to those at the bottom of the tax scale who get none of the little let-outs and loopholes. They bear the full brunt of tax, and in a number of respects they will be disadvantaged by the small steps towards a 20p band if those small steps are financed by tax allowances not being indexed.

The work done by the hon. Members for Preston (Mrs. Wise) and for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) in the famous amendment was an important part of tackling poverty. It was a measure to ensure that the Government did not continue without statutory or parliamentary authority to scoop tax from those least able to bear additional tax burdens. In any year in which the Government fail to abide by the Rooker-Wise principles, they deserve to be challenged and tested, because the case that they have advanced for gaining extra tax income to deal with the PSBR is not improved when elements of that tax income seem to be earned unfairly from those least able to bear it.

The case is undermined by the fact that the failure to spend money on various investments has prolonged the recession and, therefore, increased the PSBR. If the Government want to come to the House and say, "Yes—we made a mess, we have a problem and we have a huge public sector borrowing requirement; as the Red Book shows, we shall have a huge public sector borrowing requirement even if we get growth; yes, we need to raise tax revenue to get that growth," why do they not use known, fair and trusted parts of the tax system to raise that revenue instead of raising it by the back door?

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) described the freezing of personal allowances as a sneaky measure. He is absolutely right, because the freezing of personal allowances is a tax rise in all but name. The measure will hit both ends of the income scale. It will bring more people on middle incomes into paying tax at the higher rate. It will have a serious impact on poorer families in my region—hon. Members will know that my region has the greatest concentration of low-paid people in the country. It will ensure that they pay a hefty price for the Government's economic mismanagement.

I was taken by the speech of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who managed to dig himself into a substantial hole by arguing that, in 1981, it was necessary to do exactly what is being done now, in the hope that it would never be done again. However, 12 years later we have more unemployed people, a bigger public sector borrowing requirement and graver economic circumstances than ever before. Who was in charge during that period? It was certainly not the Labour party. The Minister and his hon. and right hon. Friends got us into the current mess. Frankly, the poorest people in the country are now paying the price for that mess.

The measure before us today is not only a tax on the poor—it is a tax on my region in the north. Across the country, 300,000 people who do not pay tax at present will be brought into the tax net for the first time. The 4·5 million people who are low-paid and who pay tax at the 20p rate at present will also lose. They will not gain a penny from the extension of the 20p band, but will lose from the freezing of allowances. They will be asked to contribute to the £700 million tax bill that the freeze on allowances will cost taxpayers.

As usual, the Red Book is fairly categorical. We are talking about enormous sums of revenue that will be raised by this back-door tax rise. Inevitably, the measure will penalise those who are least able to pay. That is in keeping with the Government's record of switching the tax burden from the rich to the poor in the 1980s. The poor were certainly not invited to the tax-cutting party of the 1980s, but they are now being asked to clear up the mess. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield and his hon. Friends are to blame for that situation.

Mr. Tim Smith: Did the hon. Gentleman not hear the figures that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary gave to the House? Under this Government, the personal tax allowance has risen substantially in real terms, whereas it fell under a Labour Government. If the Labour party is so committed to the eradication of poverty, why did a Labour Government so furiously resist the Rooker-Wise amendment?

Mr. Milburn: If the hon. Gentleman has read this Red Book and previous ones, he will know that the tax system has changed over the past 14 years, from one in which the rich paid more tax than the poor to one in which the poor paid more tax than the rich. It is a Robin Hood in reverse —and the figures are categorical. As the Financial Secretary knows, between 1978-79 and 1992-93, a typical family on average earnings has seen its tax burden rise from 35·2 per cent. to 36·7 per cent. of its income. Between 1979 and 1990, the poorest 20 per cent. of households saw their tax bill rise from 30·7 per cent. to 39·7 per cent. of their income, while the top 20 per cent. saw their tax take a fall from 37·3 per cent. to 33·5 per cent.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): I refer the hon. Gentleman to some questions tabled by the then Labour Front-Bench spokesman, the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), about the effect on the tax take of reducing the top income tax rate from 60p to 40p. What he discovered in hostile questions was that not only the cash amount from the richest section of the community increased but the proportion which the richest section of the community contributed to the total tax take increased as well. The supply side effect was real.

5.15 pm

Mr. Milburn: The hon. Gentleman must have read my speech, because I am coming precisely to the effect of the top rate tax cuts and the contrast between the 1988 giveaway Budget under Chancellor Lawson and the current Budget.

The shift in the tax burden from the rich to the poor has been achieved by deliberate Government policy instruments. For the poor, it has been achieved by shifting the burden of taxation from direct to indirect taxes.

At the same time, a growing number of people on low incomes have been drawn into paying tax through fiscal drag, as their tax-free income has shrunk in relation to average earnings. For the rich, the shift has been achieved by huge cuts in the top tax rate. I shall refer to that point in a moment.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: We repeatedly hear the point made by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-West (Mr. Butcher). The issue is that, by putting the tax burden on the rich, we are getting more tax from them. Is it not the case that that is a deception, and that the real reason why we are getting extra taxation is that many more people pay it because the indexes have not been raised in line with inflation in the way that they should be? Is that not something that the Government repeatedly try to get away with?

Mr. Milburn: As always, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is yet another case of the Government trying to perpetrate a con on the British people. The information that I have from the Financial Secretary is clear—vast sums of money were given away in the top rate tax cuts. According to his parliamentary answers, £9·5 billion has been given away to the richest people since 1988.

Mr. Dorrell: So that we are proceeding on the basis of facts rather than assertions, I must point out that the top 5 per cent. of taxpayers in 1978-79 contributed 24 per cent. of the total yield of income tax. In 1993-94, that same top 5 per cent. is expected to contribute 32 per cent. of the yield of income tax. That is the top 5 per cent. of income tax payers.

Mr. Milburn: The Financial Secretary obviously wants to bandy statistics—I am happy to do that. Perhaps he would like to tell us how many people are in the top 5 per cent. and what the spread is in the benefits of top rate tax cuts. According to his parliamentary answers, almost 60 per cent., or £5·5 billion, of the £9·5 billion handout and giveaway went to top rate taxpayers in one region of the country—the south-east.

It is no wonder that there was a huge fiscal stimulus to the economy in the south-east but, of course, we are now suffering the consequences of overheating, shortage of skilled labour, pressure on the green belt and a huge explosion in house prices. The brakes had to be slammed on, as they were two or three years ago, and we are now paying the price. We are shivering as a consequence of a countrywide recession, which is the result of the sort of measures that were implemented in 1988 by the Minister and his predecessors.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: My hon. Friend referred to what the top 5 per cent. paid in taxation. Does he agree that their income also rose in that period?

Mr. Milburn: We have seen an explosion in the incomes of the very richest people. I described earlier how the top 20 per cent. have done so well, while the bottom 20 per cent. have done so poorly. There is no doubt that families on average earnings are, as a consequence of the Government's fiscal policy during the past 14 years, paying more of their income in tax than ever before. Those are the stark facts: the Financial Secretary cannot argue with them.

I give one example. A top rate taxpayer in the south-east of England is on average at least £10,000 better off as a consequence of top-rate tax cuts. The south-east has not been the biggest regional gainer. The south-west takes the lead in the top-rate tax cut league. It is interesting to examine which parts of the United Kingdom do least well out of top-rate tax cuts. Not surprisingly, Northern Ireland and my region, the north, received the smallest benefits as a consequence of the cuts in top-rate income tax.

[Mr. Milburn]

What a contrast between 1988 and the Finance Bill that we are debating today. In 1988, there was an enormous handout and a tax bonanza for the rich. As a consequence of the measures presented by the present Chancellor in his Budget this year, there will be tax increases of £6·5 billion in 1994-95 and £10·5 billion in 1995-96.

The cost of imposing VAT on heating alone will mean £950 million in higher bills next year and £2·3 billion in the following years. The whole country is paying the price for the Conservatives' tax bonanza for the wealthy in 1988. What they gave away with one hand to the very rich, they are taking back with the other from pensioners, families, the low-paid and those on middle incomes. It is an odd reversal of the Robin Hood story when the poorest end up subsidising the richest in our community.

Mr. Graham: The other day I spoke to a woman in my constituency who told me that she had looked at her diary for 1979. It was faded, but she noticed that her husband was working, her two sons were working and she was going on holiday to Benidorm. Now she is not going on holiday to Benidorm, her son is not working, her other son is on low pay and her man is almost crippled with illness.

In 1979, at least they were all working and they could afford to pay tax. Now 4 million people are desperate and 3 million people are unemployed. The other night we passed a measure which will mean that 9 million pensioners will have to pay through the nose to heat their homes. The Government are proud of that record. The crisis is one of their own making. My hon. Friend has elaborated on that well tonight.

Mr. Milburn: My hon. Friend is right. He graphically describes the problems that the Government have imposed on millions of people in Britain. It is not merely a question of complacency. It is a question of the Government's inability to apologise to the British people. We saw that most graphically in the private notice question just before this debate. I will not go into that, Mr. Morris, because I can see that you wish me to move on. I will take that hint seriously.

So we are now all paying for that tax bonanza. By freezing personal allowances, the Government will force the tax burden of low and middle-income families through the roof. Rightly, people will feel betrayed by a party which in its general election manifesto just one year ago loudly declared:

"we are the only party that understands the need for low taxation."

The Conservatives' tax-cutting credentials have been shot through by this measure and other measures in the Finance Bill. In just one month next year—April—the British people will feel the effect of the cuts in mortgage interest relief at source and the married couple's allowance, the increase in national insurance and the introduction of the fuel tax. Ministers might not be so complacent then. Certainly the crisis of confidence which the Government face will not go away, because too many people are paying through the nose for the mistakes that have been made.

Mr. David Shaw: The Government have had a difficult Budget to prepare when we are, as we have now discovered, at the end of a recession. As we reach the end of the recession, sadly, unemployment—the lagging indicator—increases and the deficit continues to rise for some time after one has hit the bottom. There is no doubt that we are having to raise additional finance because we have an excessive budget deficit.

There are not many ways in which one can deal with an excessive budget deficit. Indeed, my accountancy career has taught me that there are only three: we can borrow, if someone will lend to us, but if the deficit is excessive, people do not want to lend to us; or we can raise additional revenue; or we can cut expenditure.

It is clear that no one in the Conservative party wanted major areas of expenditure to be cut. They did not want pensioners, invalids, or those on disability benefits to suffer and they did not want cuts in health service or education expenditure. Consequently, the Government have chosen the course of raising some additional revenue and they should be applauded for taking that courageous decision.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: If the Government decided that the right course of action was to raise revenue, why did not they seek to raise it from the very people who gained from the tax cuts that they introduced a few years ago? Why are the Government seeking revenue increases from the bottom part of the earnings structure when they gave those tax breaks to the top?

Mr. Shaw: As my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary said, the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues are living in a mythological world. In many instances, the top 5 per cent. who received the reduction in the rate of taxation have increased their earnings and the wealth that they have brought into the country. As a result, they have paid an increased proportion of the income tax bill. That is a major achievement and we must encourage that expansion.

I want the top rate of tax to come down lower. It is sad that we wish to cut only the basic rate from 25 to 20 per cent. We should consider how to reduce the top rate from 40 per cent. We are now competing in the world to bring the wealth creators to Britain. If we could encourage more of them to come here, more revenue would be raised from income tax at lower rates. That is the great achievement of the Government.

I return to my key point. We must either raise revenue or cut expenditure. The Opposition argue that we might be in a different world if they were in office. They say that the deficit would be considerably less. They are trying to con the electorate into believing that if they were in office, we would be in a make-believe world. That is the only world that would be different. One cannot say that if Labour was in office there would be no German recession, no French recession and no American recession. We live in this world. We do not live in the make-believe world that the Labour party would like to exist if it was in office.

So revenue had to be raised in the Budget. Clause 52, with which the amendment deals, is the right clause and the right measure to raise additional revenue.

Public finances have to be prudently managed. Reference has been made to the Labour manifesto's proposals which we costed at some £37 billion. I commend the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) for remembering that figure. That £37 billion was not what the deficit might have been; it was additional to any deficit that we now have. If Labour had been in office and the recession had continued—I am talking about the recession in America, Germany and France, which are key export markets—we would be looking at a deficit not of £50 billion but of £50 billion plus £37 billion; a deficit of at least £87 billion, approaching £100 billion.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Shaw: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, who no doubt wants to explain how a Labour Government would have financed such a deficit.

5.30 pm

Mr. Cunningham: I shall not explain that aspect. I should have liked the hon. Gentleman to have gone on to say that the difference between the Labour party and the Government at the time of the general election was that Labour borrowing would have been used for investment, whereas the money that you have borrowed is to pay your debts. That is the fundamental difference between you and us.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he is addressing me when he says "you", and I am not responsible.

Mr. Cunningham: I apologise, Dame Janet.

Mr. Shaw: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman because I, like many people, studied the Labour party manifesto carefully. More significantly, I made a number of interventions in the speeches of Labour Front-Bench spokesmen in the year or two before the general election asking if the commitments that they were annoucing at the Dispatch Box were firm commitments. I started to add them up on the back of an envelope and on my calculator. They were not capital commitments to invest in Britain's future. Many of them were revenue commitments to invest in more pay, more salaries and more bureaucracy. They were the sort of commitments that would have to be funded with increased borrowing. As an accountant, I know that to fund wages and salaries with borrowing is the worst sort of deficit financing.

Mr. Graham: I take the point that the hon. Gentleman did his sums on the back on an envelope. I am pretty sure that everyone in the Committee and in the country will agree that the Government, too, have done their sums on the back on an envelope. The hon. Gentleman has a fond interest in Scottish affairs. In Strathclyde we have lost more than 50 per cent. of our manufacturing jobs since 1979—166,000 jobs. The Labour party planned an investment and training programme. That was what part of the sum was intended for. That was welcomed by the people of Scotland and, I am sure, by the people of Britain who wanted Scotland once again to be the engine of recovery. The £36 billion of public sector borrowing would clearly have been welcomed. It would have provided a basis from which to build on in the future and we might not have had this recession, which has clearly been created by the Government.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman's intervention is becoming a speech.

Mr. Shaw: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's contribution. As he rightly says, I have a great interest in Scotland and some Scottish affairs. I am sure that he will recall that under Labour, between 1974 and 1979, not just in Scotland but in the country as a whole, manufacturing output fell and we had a record number of industrial disputes and a major problem in getting enough investment in British manufacturing.

Yesterday, the Select Committee on Social Security heard from managers of the British Coal pension fund about its problems. It was notable that the deficits from the fund's investments occurred under a Labour Government who made generous contributions to compensate. The surpluses that have improved pensioners' benefits have come since the Conservative Government have been in office. Those surpluses have been earned from the success of British business and British industry, so there has been a major transformation.

We might well ask why some areas of Scotland, for which the hon. Gentleman and I share an interest and concern, have not benefited. I am concerned, even as the Member of Parliament for Dover, that some of the benefits in our economy are not filtering through into the Scottish economy. The only possible explanation is that too much of the Scottish economy is managed by Labour-controlled local authorities.

If we could shift the resource base from the Labour-controlled local authorities in Scotland into the private sector, my constituents in Dover would benefit from a better managed economy. The Government might not even have had to introduce clause 52. Public finances overall would be better managed because we would be spending less money in the public sector and getting more profitable investment and more profitable resource development in the private sector.

Mr. Graham: The hon. Gentleman mentioned Scotland, but he must realise that the Scottish public have rejected the Government for decades. I wish that the Scottish people could have a wee turn at giving the Prime Minister a bloody nose like the English and Welsh voters. I am sure that they would give him a real belt in the belly if they had the chance of a referendum.

Mr. Shaw: I do not want to stray too far from the subject, but the hon. Gentleman must accept that the problems that are developing in Monklands, East and a number of other key Labour areas show that a unique opportunity is developing for the Conservative party in the 1990s in Scotland. There is no question but that, when the people of Scotland see how much employment in the public sector is taking job opportunities from the private sector in Scotland, there will be a transformation in the Government's political fortunes in Scotland. That is already occurring, as can be seen from the improved results in Scotland at the general election.

But to return to my main point, if Labour had been in office we would not be sitting here today talking about whether we can afford to index personal allowances or other allowances. We would be talking about how to deal with a major deficit of enormous proportions—potentially £100 billion.

Dr. Roger Berry (Kingswood): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the rate of growth under this Government has been the worst of any post-war British Government and far worse than that of the previous Labour Government, that as a result unemployment is far higher and that that is the major reason for the high level of public sector borrowing?

Mr. Shaw: I just happen to have a graph here which I have produced on my computer. However, graphs cannot be recorded in Hansard, so I shall have to talk about it. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the real prosperity clearly existed in the 1980s. The only significant cuts in public expenditure where the line on the graph falls below zero took place under a Labour Government in 1975, 1976 and 1977. Since then, public expenditure and the nation's prosperity have continued to improve. Therefore, I cannot accept what the hon. Gentleman says.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues, I should point out that he is going wide of the amendment. I have given one or two warnings already and if the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member persists, they will have to resume their seat.

Mr. Shaw: Thank you, Dame Janet. I desperately wanted to get back to the main point, but I was diverted into Scotland and some of the wider issues of the economy. I appreciate that you are being your usual firm self, but I realise, as I am sure do many, that a better balance in many areas of the economy, of which Scotland is one, between the public and private sectors, would mean that the private sector would create more jobs and there would be less deficit and consequently less need to restrain the increase in personal allowances in the way in which the clause does. That is the key point. The real issue raised by the Opposition in this debate is whether we should curtail allowances or raise the rates of income tax. The Opposition have not lost their old clothes. They have dusted them down again, having found them in the closet. They want to raise the rates of income tax. I cannot support that view.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: That is not so.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman says that that is not so. If he does not want to increase revenue by raising the rates of income tax, either he must want to cut expenditure or he must want to borrow more. If not, I do not see how he will be able to meet the deficit which, as I said earlier, occurs not just in the United Kingdom but worldwide.

Mr. Brown: I made this point to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), but perhaps the hon. Gentleman was not paying his usual attention. In 1988, the Labour party voted against the Government's top rate tax cuts. That is still our position. We should not have a deficit if the top rate of tax had not been cut, for it amounts to a substantial sum of money. [Interruption.] The Financial Secretary laughs, but cumulatively that extra sum of money would have been available to the Government since 1988. The purpose of our amendment is not to increase income tax. Its purpose is to restore the allowances that the Financial Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer are trying to freeze.

Mr. Shaw: I know that the hon. Gentleman uses a wide base when he studies these issues. He has heard of the Laffer curve. If the rate of taxation is too high, the amount of revenue raised goes down. The Financial Secretary has produced the figures and has shown that, by reducing the top rate of income tax, we have increased the revenue take from the top earners. That, surely, is the key point.

Mr. Brown: But the hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that now there are 1 million more of them.

Mr. Shaw: The point that I acknowledge is that the top 5 per cent. are paying more as a proportion of the total income tax take.

Mr. Dorrell rose——

Mr. Shaw: Does my hon. Friend wish to confirm that point?

Mr. Dorrell: Yes. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) is completely wrong. The group of people about whom I was talking numbered 1·3 million in 1978-79. In 1993-94, it numbers 1·2 million, so, for what it is worth, there has been a fractional reduction, not a big increase in the number of individuals concerned. What has increased is the share of the income tax burden that those 1·3 million or 1·2 million people contribute. That share has increased sharply, from 24 per cent. to 32 per cent. of the total yield of income tax.

Mr. Shaw: What my hon. Friend has said shows that it is a truism that, if we reduce the rate of income tax, we increase revenue. That must be a very important lesson. I know that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East wants to rise and confirm that those who sit on the Opposition Front Bench have now learnt that lesson.

Mr. Brown: We are talking, I think, about different groups of people. If I heard him aright, the Financial Secretary is talking about the top 5 per cent. of high earners, to whom he referred earlier, whereas I am referring to all those who pay tax at the top rate. The hon. Gentleman's argument is absurd. If one received more revenue by reducing the tax rate, the logical assumption is that even more revenue would accrue to the Government if one reduced the tax rate yet further, but that obviously is not the case.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Gentleman knows how the graph works. He also knows how the calculation works: that at a tax rate of 100 per cent. there is zero revenue, because there is no point in going out to work. The hon. Gentleman must also know that if one reduces tax rates to too low a level, the Government will not raise the maximum amount of revenue. The key point of the Laffer curve as it is computed is that the optimum tax rate is of the order of 15, 20 or 25 per cent., depending upon which country one is in and depending also upon the financial base that one uses. It is clear that, even at 40 per cent. tax rates, there may be the opportunity to lower still further the top tax rate and increase revenue. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East told me off for not paying attention, so he should not converse with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), but perhaps he suffers from my weakness from time to time.

The key point is that the Government have made the decision not to change allowances, thereby increasing revenue, instead of attempting to raise additional revenue by increasing the rate of income tax. That would have been a disincentive. It would not have been the right thing to do as we come out of the recession. It would have put on the motor car's brakes; it would have stopped the engine; it would have taken away the fuel that can help us to get out of the recession. The Government have done the right thing and it was a sensible decision to make.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is not it clear from these exchanges that the Opposition have learnt nothing from the experience of the past 14 years? Some people may think it incredible that my hon. Friend should suggest a tax rate of 100 per cent., but there was a tax rate of 98 per cent. in 1979. That was the rate that we inherited.

5.45 pm

Mr. Shaw: I agree with my hon. Friend. If ever there were a case for a "quickie" general election, it would be on the basis of what we have heard from those who sit on the Opposition Front Bench today. The Opposition have no new taxation policy to present to the British electorate. All they want to do is to tax the British electorate more and more and to employ more and more civil servants and bureaucrats. The Opposition still have the wrong policies for tackling the economic issues that face us as we come out of the recession. The fact of the matter is——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. How does this relate to the amendment under consideration?

Mr. Shaw: You are right, Dame Janet. Again I have been taken slightly away from the point. I was carried away by my enthusiasm for increasing our majority and having another term in government.

The key point is that we are still wedded to reducing the rate of income tax over a period of time. That was featured consistently in our successful, election-winning manifestos. The Opposition want to tackle the tax issue differently. They want to raise tax rates and change the way in which taxes are raised. Our policies contain the right balance. The Budget was skilfully constructed in the middle of a worldwide recession that is causing great difficulties. The Budget deficit continues to increase and the lagging indicator—unemployment—is inevitably at a higher level than one would like.

Clause 52 reflects the fact that both the foreign and the domestic financial markets have given the Government a considerable vote of confidence. The British electorate should recognise the fact and consider giving a further vote of confidence to the Government in any future by-elections. That vote of confidence should be based on the difficult decision that is reflected in the clause we are debating.

Mr. Rooker: What we are debating today, if we cut through the bull and the smears on Opposition policies by Conservative Members today, is a tax increase on the low-paid. At least 300,000 people, who would not otherwise have to do so, will now have to pay income tax. Furthermore, those at the bottom end of the tax threshold —4·5 million people—will not enjoy the benefits that they ought to receive. We shall no doubt hear the Financial Secretary refer to what happened between 1974 and 1979. That point has already been made clear in interventions.

My conscience is clear. My record is okay. The same cannot be said of the Government's record. In 1993, the tax burden on the British economy is greater than it was in 1978-79. Compared with this Government's record, the last Labour Government have nothing to apologise for when it comes to the tax burden on the British economy. I freely admit that the burden is shared differently—hence the steps that I took as an individual hon. Member in 1977. Earlier, I interrupted from a sedentary position to remind the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) of the date —14 June.

If the Finance Bill had not been amended in 1977, we would not be able to hold this debate today. We can debate this proposed tax increase on the low-paid because of what happened in Committee on 14 June 1977, when I and my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise), then the Member for Coventry, South-West, moved amendments on indexation. It is not the fault of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), but that night we did not enjoy the support of the Liberal party. John Pardoe was upset because, as part of the Lib-Lab pact, he was obliged to vote with the Government. He was very distressed because indexation was Liberal policy.

I want to consider the obnoxious tax increase on low-paid people, and in doing so I shall give a couple of statistics on the tax burden. Between 1978-79 and 1992-93, as a share of income, the tax burden—income tax and national insurance—declined for single people, married couples and people on average earnings or above who had children. In the same period, the tax burden for people on less than average earnings also fell, with the glaring exception that the share of income that family units—couples with children—on less than average earnings pay in tax and national insurance, taking into account child benefit, is greater now than in the last year of the Labour Government. The share paid by the poorest families—those on three quarters or half average earnings—is higher than under the previous Labour Government. They are a unique group.

It is tedious to keep repeating statistics, but I will give the figures for a family with two children and 50 per cent. of average earnings. Hon. Members might regard 50 per cent. of average earnings as irrelevant or unrealistic, but average earnings are alleged to be £340 a week. When I say that, most of my constituents say "Don't talk silly—our wages are nothing like that," and that is true of the majority of people because the average is not the majority.

The share of income that a couple on 50 per cent. of average earnings with two children paid in income tax and national insurance, minus child benefit, in 1978-79 was 2·4 per cent. whereas in 1992-93 it was 6·3 per cent.

Mr. David Shaw: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rooker: No.

The share of income paid by a couple on 75 per cent. of average earnings has increased from 14·6 per cent. to 15·5 per cent. In other words, whatever changes have occurred in that period, couples on less than average earnings with children have suffered uniquely and their position will be made worse by the freezing of tax allowances, which is why the clause is so objectionable.

Mr. Dorrell: I have made a calculation for a married man with two children—a single earner in the household —on half average earnings. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, since 1979 and at today's values, the real take-home pay of that person has risen by £67·30p a week?

Mr. Rooker: Absolutely—I am coming to that. I am talking about the income share that such a family pays in tax and national insurance. The share that they pay from their household earnings has gone up, whereas it has gone down for everybody on more than average earnings. It has gone down for single people, married couples and families on more than average earnings. It has gone down for single people on less than average earnings. It has gone down for married couples on less than average earnings without children. It has, uniquely, gone up for couples on less than average earnings with children. What a record—low-earning families with children are the poorest-paid and the hardest stressed group in the country.

The important point is the share. We are talking about the community kitty for the country. That is the purpose of taxation—for people according to their means to pay into the community kitty. Why are the lowest-paid families on less than average earnings with children paying a larger share of their income than in the last year of the Labour Government? Why should their share of the community kitty have gone up when everyone else's has gone down?

Mr. Dorrell: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the changes in the totality of the tax system which have been made since 1979 may have led to the enhanced rate of improvement in the take-home pay of every group in the community, including the group that he is talking about?

Mr. Rooker: Exactly, but relative to everybody else the share of the burden that they are asked to bear has gone up. The Minister cannot deny that. No one denies that their absolute earnings have gone up. Earnings kept ahead of inflation in the 1980s, which caused some of our present difficulties, but why has their share of the community kitty increased when everybody else's has gone down? Why has the share of income that the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw), as a Member of Parliament, perhaps with outside earnings, has to pay gone down? Why should the poorest paid families on less than average earnings with children, uniquely, be asked to pay more? The Minister argues that their earnings have gone up, but the share of earnings that they are asked to pay has gone up while everyone else's has gone down.

That is the reality of the debate and not what the hon. Member for Dover was saying. An increase in taxation is being proposed for the poorest people in the country. They are being asked to pay a bigger share of their income in tax than anybody else. I was opposed to that in 1977 when I proposed amendments in Committee and I am opposed to it now.

I do not deny that the spending power of all families and sectors has increased, but those on less than average earnings have done substantially less well than the better off. That is my argument. My argument is one of fairness between groups in society—those on low incomes and those on high incomes. I believe that people who have high incomes should pay a bigger share, and indeed they will pay a bigger share this year, but during this Government's term of office their share has gone down while the share taken from the poorest paid families has gone up. That needs to be emphasised and constantly repeated. That is why we oppose the clause, which stops indexation.

Mr. David Shaw: I believe that at one stage, the hon. Gentleman referred to household income rather than individual income. The average household income increasingly includes the incomes of two people—husband and wife—because more women work today under this Government than when Labour was in office. As a result, a higher rate of income tax may often be paid in a two-income household, because when the two incomes are added together more taxation is paid at the higher rate. That can often account for the phenomenon that the hon. Gentleman has identified.

Mr. Rooker: I used the term "household income" as a figure of speech, but I was talking about earnings, and the figures that I cited related to earnings. Generally speaking, when figures are produced for a married couple with two children, it is assumed that there will be one earner and one non-earner. the wages earned by some of the women in the families affected are so low that they would not make any difference to the tables, which are produced by the research staff in the Library on the basis of parliamentary answers.

I have been talking about low pay, so by definition I have been talking about earnings, and about people who have jobs. We must not forget that the unemployed are also subject to taxation at certain periods. During the year in which they cease to be employed and during the year in which they obtain another job, unemployment benefit is part of their annual taxable income. The impost does not fall only on people with a low-paid full-time or part-time job; the unemployed are also caught in the tax net now. Some of them are also subject, at the margins, to the effects of the clause and the freezing of personal allowances.

The Minister may say, "What is all the fuss about? It is only £18 a year."

Mr. Dorrell: At the maximum.

Mr. Rooker: Yes, that is the maximum—or rather, it is £22 a year for the average family but £18 for a single person. People will say, "Eighteen pounds? That is chicken feed." Hon. Members may pay that much for their lunch or their supper, or even leave that much as a tip after their supper. But I have met constituents—my hon. Friends have met such people, and I know that Conservative Members have met them, too—who could not raise that sum at any stage in their yearly existence.

I thought of a couple of examples today involving unemployed constituents seeking to get back into work, who had used the opportunity of unemployment to further their education. But they could not pay the exam fees. One person could not pay the £10 assessment fee for nursing training. When people are that low down the income scale they do not have the money. That is why it is wholly unfair to ask those people to pay an increased share of taxation. It is immoral—there is no other word for it.

I do not accept the argument that the sum is small, because I consider that sum not in isolation but in the context of the generality of what other taxpayers are asked to pay. There should be fair shares. The well-off should pay their fair share, but the clause freezes allowances in such a way that they will not pay as fair a share as they would otherwise have done.

One of the long-running advantages of the 1977 indexation measures—although they have subsequently been amended, the kernel of them remains—is that these days at Budget time the Treasury publishes tables which make a good comparison with what the figures would have been like if there had been indexation. Indeed, I was amazed at the brass face of the Budget press release dated 16 March, with its illustrative tables on income tax rates and allowances. Every hon. Member has an average of 500 constituents who will now pay tax at 20p in the pound although they did not pay tax before the Budget. The average number is 500, so some hon. Members will have many more constituents in that position.

The Treasury tables showing the annual effects of the income tax changes in the Budget, compared with what indexation would have provided, has to assume an increase in incomes. When comparing one year with another one must not assume that incomes will stay the same; one must assume an increase in earnings. I thought that the Treasury would assume an increase of 1·5 per cent., but not on your life—the Treasury assumed an increase of 4 per cent.

Why did the Treasury assume that incomes would increase by 4 per cent. between 1992-93 and 1993-94 when there is a 1·5 per cent. pay freeze in the public sector which also runs through the low-paid part of the private sector? What brass face the Treasury and Ministers must have to approve the use of 4 per cent. as an illustrative figure when they have introduced a pay freeze of 1·5 per cent. That is outrageous. When the Financial Secretary winds up the debate, I should like him to tell us why the figure of 4 per cent. was approved. That figure does not represent reality for most people.

I shall finish soon, because the point has been well made that the effect of the clause is a massive tax increase for the low-paid. The burden is greater for the low-paid—especially if they have children—than for the rest of the country, and to that extent it is extremely unfair.

Because of the increased burden of taxation on the low-paid, we are creating in this country an underclass of citizens who are bewildered by the system and who struggle to make ends meet from one week to the next. Hon. Members all know this from what they hear in their constituency surgeries, and from the letters and telephone calls that even Conservative Members mention. In a debate not long ago, a Conservative Back Bencher referred to the people who shuffled into his surgery with a haunted look in their eyes, the down-beaten and downtrodden who could not cope because of the increased tax burden and the cuts in benefits that his own Government had brought about. I shall not cause that Conservative Member any more trouble than he is already in by reminding the Committee of his name.

According to the average figure, 500 constituents of mine will pay tax at 20p in the pound rather than paying nothing as, because they are so low-paid, they would otherwise have done. I am speaking for those people tonight, as my hon. Friends have spoken for their constituents. No Conservative Member has said, "Well, that is it. I have some low-paid constituents, and it is tough, but they will just have to pay more tax." Conservative Members will not have the courage to say that.

Instead they will say that the budget has to be balanced and extra revenue is needed. Nobody denies that, but why take from people on lower than average earnings a greater share of their income than is taken from people on higher than average earnings? That is wholly unfair, and we shall certainly pin it on the Government.

What will the money pay for? The Government were open about that. The brief published on Budget day gave a little summary of the measures for 1993-94:

"The Chancellor proposes that there should be little net change in . . . 1993-94. Certain taxes are reduced: there is help for business and the housing market".

There certainly is help for business. Some of the extra taxation brought in by the clause—brought in off the backs of people so low paid that they were not paying tax at all—will help to fund businesses such as the Heron corporation so that money can be forked out for the Ronsons of this world.

The idea is outrageous. It is beyond belief that that is the sort of business that the Government are supporting. They will raise taxes on the low-paid and say, "Yes, we want to get business going," but they give no directions and no special incentives to ensure that that money is put into real investment to create real jobs, now factories and new businesses. No—businesses will be able to do exactly what they like.

Mr. Tim Smith: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but the Red Book shows that the main factor was the decision not to increase business rates by more than the rate of inflation. Had that decision not been made, many businesses might have been pushed over the brink and jobs would have been lost. There is a balance between jobs and income tax. Which would people prefer to have—a job, with earnings on which they had to pay income tax, or no job?

Mr. Rooker: For my sins, I was the Opposition local government spokesman in 1987-88 when the Bill introducing the poll tax was in Committee. It took 200 hours. We were dealing with the business rate, the poll tax for business, and we shot the Government's arguments to pieces. The rates that business pays as an overall proportion are minuscule. I do not accept the argument that to help businesses we have to impose more taxes on the low-paid. That is what I cannot justify. We cannot consider one small provision of the Bill in isolation.

This provision will raise money on the backs of the low paid. What will it be used for? It will be used to reduce the tax burden on businesses. It is unfair to expect people whose earnings are 50 per cent. of the average to pay a bigger share than the average Member of Parliament or the Gerald Ronsons of this world for the purpose of reducing the taxes paid by businesses. Nobody is on lower pay than those who until now were below the tax threshold.

There must be no taxation by stealth. In this regard, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield was quite honest and open. As I look at the Strangers Gallery, to which I am not supposed to refer, I expect that very few people realise that what we are debating here is a big increase in taxation. What is being done is not being done by stealth, as in the past. The Committee has an opportunity to debate and to vote. When I found out in 1977 how the system worked I objected strongly. The roof came in on my hon. Friend the Member for Preston and myself for what we were doing. We were criticised by the press and by the leadership of our own party. But then the penny dropped as messages came in from pensioners' groups and trade union branches. It is much fairer to have things done in the open.

The tax burden on the poor is too great, and the Government are reverting to the previous process. Next year they will say that the rate of inflation this year was only 2·6 per cent. and that the forecast figure for the following year is 3·6 per cent.—nowhere near the level of the late 1970s. They think that if they get away with freezing allowances in one year, they will get away with it again. We are returning, step by step, to the old system of taxation by stealth.

This process must be opposed at every turn. In 1981 I came to the Chamber and opposed what was being done. I will act similarly today, and I will continue to do so. I do not take any pleasure in this. It takes time, and it is not easy to explain to people outside. What members of the public do know, however, is that under the Budget taxes on the low-paid have increased.

I should like to make again a point that I made at the end of the Second Reading debate, when between the end of the Financial Secretary's winding-up speech and the Division I used the procedure of the House for a couple of minutes without upsetting everyone. In the course of a visit to Hereford and Worcester that day, I was asked what I was doing about the Rooker-Wise amendment. The person concerned, having been sucked back into the tax system many times, understood how it worked. He was so close to the margin that he knew he would be in the system for half of the year and out of it for the remainder.

I understood the mechanics. He realised that the Budget would result in freezing—that, having been sucked into the tax system, he would stay there. He regarded that as wholly unfair. I told him that, having been on the Opposition Benches for 14 years, I did not have much responsibility for the situation but that I would go to the House of Commons at the first opportunity and raise the point.

Mr. David Shaw: This is why the hon. Gentleman is in opposition.

Mr. Rooker: Far from it.

The point that I am making illustrates the unfairness of freezing allowances. By definition, as everyone knows, the burden on those with less than average earnings is disproportionately great. The Government will not increase income tax by a penny in the pound, because that would have the reverse effect. They do not want to attack the well-off. Tory Governments are bound to adopt this attitude. They talk about tax cuts, but they raise taxes. They talk about decreasing the tax burden, but they increase it—not only the overall burden on the economy but also the burden on the lowest-paid.

We shall nail the Government with this. It will not be easy, as was demonstrated in 1987 and 1992. It is not easy to get this message across, even during general election campaigns. The Conservatives always quote the 83 per cent. and 98 per cent. tax rates under the last Labour Government, as in the ebb and flow of politics they are quite entitled to do, but nobody ever paid at those rates. The average rate was far less. It was stupid of the last Labour Government to have high tax rates that were not actually used. They were warned that those rates would be used against them. At the other end of the scale, the system was such that tax revenue could be raised from the low paid.

Then the Tory party thought that it would be a good idea to introduce some truth into the tax system. The get-out clause was introduced by a former Chancellor, now Lord Lawson. At the back of the noble Lord's mind was the idea that a Tory Government needed a get-out. The Financial Secretary appears not to know what a get-out is. Perhaps I will have an opportunity to explain to him later.

Our original amendment on indexation was cut and dried. There would have been no get-out, but for an amendment tagged on at the end by a specific vote in the House. That is how the tax law was left at the time. Today we are at least guaranteed a debate, and some of us are able to demonstrate that it is very unfair to put this extra tax burden on the low-paid. I invite the Financial Secretary to defend disproportionately great tax increases for those people: he cannot do it.

Mr. Dorrell: Members of all parties agree that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) takes a serious interest in these issues. Indeed, the Committee is indebted to him for the part that he played in 1977 in ensuring that we could have this debate today. He has said that at that time everybody was against him. As he would be the first to acknowledge, our parliamentary system does not work in quite that way.

Far from everybody being against the hon. Gentleman, the Conservative party of the time, of which I think my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) is the only representative present today, supported him. The Rooker-Wise amendment that has been referred to is, in fact, the Rooker-Wise-Lawson amendment. The action of the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) was supported by the Tory party.

We do not resile at all from the decision that the Government took then. We believe that, as the hon. Gentleman has said, changes in the real level of allowances should be the subject of debate in the Chamber. That is precisely why we are having this debate. Thus far, at least, I go along with the hon. Gentleman. I shall refer later to some of his arguments that I found to be substantially less convincing.

I should like to start with something that ought to be obvious. My hon. Friends the Members for Dover (Mr. Shaw) and Beaconsfield said that this element of the Bill is part of the total package that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor introduced to deal with the budget deficit. It is most remarkable that a constant in the debates we have had on this Bill is the assertion—made sometimes in almost accusatorial tones by the Opposition—that these are revenue-raising proposals, as though we had somehow stumbled over them almost in a fit of absence of mind. It is true that many of the changes made in the Bill are put together as a revenue-raising package.

The reason for that should not be surprising or unfamiliar to any hon. Member. It is that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor faced the need to do something about the Budget deficit. The Government take the budget deficit seriously. As these debates proceed, it is becoming abundantly clear that the Labour party does not share our commitment to a policy of seriously addressing the deficit. Over the past few weeks and months, we have seen several examples of that lack of firmness of purpose. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has been anxious to rule out options which may help deal with the budget deficit. In January, on the radio, he said:

"I'm not talking about raising income tax or national insurance or VAT."

That was said by the shadow Chancellor, who acknowledges that the budget deficit is too high but is anxious to rule out the three key tax weapons available to do something about it. In March, just before the Budget was delivered, he said on television.

"I think at this particular point in time to raise income tax or national insurance or VAT would be a mistake."

So all three major sources of revenue available to the Government were explicitly ruled out twice, on the record, by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East.

While the hon. Gentleman has been busy telling the world what he would not do to address the budget deficit, his hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) has been going round telling the world what she would do to make the budget deficit worse. She has been committing the Labour party to extra expenditure on training and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said, to more generous capital allowances. So, on the one hand, the Labour party says that the budget deficit needs attention: on the other, it either forecloses options for doing anything about it and opposes all proposals that are put to the House, or it comes forward only with proposals which would make the deficit worse.

The first thing that we have to be clear about in addressing the question is that we face a budget deficit that demands attention. The Government have a package of proposals to address the deficit. All the arguments from the Opposition Benches come from a party which has been anxious to foreclose as many options as possible for dealing with the deficit.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) was generous enough, as were other hon. Members, to acknowledge the second element: that the proposals for changes to allowances and thresholds have to be seen in the context of other proposals for changes to the income tax system, particularly the introduction of the lower rate band. The interrelationship between changes to allowances and changes to the lower rate band is a key element of the Budget package.

What the Committee would not have gathered from the speeches so far in the debate, particularly from the Opposition Benches, is that, for the single person who is a basic rate taxpayer, it is not a coincidence that the effect of the freezing of the allowances and of the widening of the basic rate band is precisely the same: they net out. For the single person on basic rate tax the freezing of allowances costs him £22·50 this year; the widening of the lower rate band benefits him to the tune of £22·50 this year. There is a statistical equivalent.

The married couple basic rate payer is £12·50 a year worse off as a consequence of the changes. Taking particularly the single person basic rate taxpayer, he is in precisely the same position after the changes as he would have been if the indexation proposal of the hon. Member for Perry Barr had been allowed to run its course in respect of both the lower rate band and the basic rate band.

There are differences. All higher rate taxpayers are losers as a consequence of the changes because the effect of freezing allowances is to ensure that the benefit available from the changes to the higher rate taxpayer is exactly the same as to the basic rate taxpayer. The hon. Member for Perry Barr was right to say that those who are marginal payers within the lower rate are to a varying degree losers in absolute terms, although I would argue strongly that they are also gainers in the sense that the marginal rate of income tax which they are paying is lower than at any time since the Government came to power.

The changes that we are introducing in the package are part of the progress that we can make to introduce a wider lower rate band which will have important positive benefits in dealing with the poverty trap, the unemployment trap and the sharpening of incentives, which must be an important priority for those on lower incomes.

Mr. Graham: Does the Minister realise that, for 14 years, we have been told that, once the Conservative Government got to grips with the economy, things would go well? For the past three years, we have been told that the end of the recession is round the corner. We have been told that by the Chancellor until he was blue in the face. The Minister is telling us that low wage earners will benefit. In God's honest truth, that is not the case. If we can prove that he is not right, will the Minister come back and reverse what he has said?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman suggests that people on average earnings, or the majority of people, have not benefited from the logic of the changes which we have been introducing for the past 14 years. As I said in an intervention in the speech of the hon. Member for Perry Barr, that is not true. Those who are on half average earnings have benefited in their take-home pay from the economic record of the Government to the tune of £67·50 a week in real terms since 1979. In the period 1974-79, the same group saw their real take-home pay increase by just over £8 a week.

People on average earnings are more than £80 a week better off than they were in 1979. Their income grew in real terms over the five years of the Labour Government by just over £1 a week. So there was an increase of £80 a week under the Tories and £1 a week under Labour; that is the contrast that answers the point made by the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham).

I have said that we cannot consider the changes in allowances in isolation from the rest of the changes to the income tax system. Nor can we consider them in isolation from the other changes contained elsewhere in the Budget. I discussed that point with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield in an intervention based on the analysis of the Institute of Fiscal Studies. It took the Budget package as a whole and looked at the distributional effect of the increase in the tax burden which my right hon. Friend introduced in his Budget.

The institute—an independent organisation—concluded that the average loss as a percentage of net income was virtually the same right across the income scale, from the poorest 10 per cent. of households to the richest 10 per cent. All of them, to within a very narrow range of variance, contribute roughly 2·5 per cent. of their net income to the deficit reduction programme which my right hon. Friend introduced in his Budget.

Of course, if the Budget is addressing the deficit by means of revenue raising, there will be by definition an average loss in resources available to taxpayers. Those figures show that that loss is shared fairly across the income scale. We cannot consider it in isolation from other income tax changes, nor in isolation from other changes elsewhere in the Budget. Nor, most important of all, can we consider it in isolation from the history of the past 20 years. That is where the record of the Government bears very favourable comparison with the record of our predecessors.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr is entitled to mark himself out in regard to his responsibility for what happened to personal allowances under the Labour Government. The effect of his action on what happened during those years is extremely marked in the figures. The year in which he rebelled was the only year of the Labour Government's period of office in which personal allowances increased in real terms. Over their total period of office, the single personal allowance fell in real terms by 21 per cent. In the period since 1979, it has risen by 25 per cent.

6.30 pm

We will not accept any lectures from members of the Opposition Front Bench on the subject of the indexation of personal allowances; nor will we accept lectures from any member of the Labour party, even including the hon. Member for Perry Barr, on the subject of the living standards of people right across the income scale.

Mr. Graham rose——

Mr. Dorrell: I said in answer to the previous intervention of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde, who is encouraging me to give way to him again, that the effect of this Government's policies taken as a whole has been to deliver a substantial increase in real take-home pay and living standards right across the income scale, benefiting the average wage earner by £81 a week, at today's values, this year, and benefiting the group on which the hon. Member for Perry Barr was focusing by just over £67 a week.

Mr. Graham: Anyone who thinks that the 3 million unemployed, the pensioners and disabled people have benefited under this Government is living in cloud cuckoo land. I want to ask the Minister what the Government have done with the money that they got from oil. How did they fritter that away? Why should we expect a pensioner to pay VAT on fuel and power when we had billions of pounds' worth of oil in the north of Scotland and in other places? How did the Government absolutely squander that?

Mr. Dorrell: One of the things that we have done is to increase by more than 50 per cent. the amount of money spent on the national health service as a result of the improved economic performance. Since 1979, we have seen a substantial improvement in Britain's economic performance, and this has been delivered to the British people by improving real take-home pay and social services. That was the commitment that we gave in 1979, 1983, 1987 and again in 1992. We have been delivering it for 14 years, and we will go on delivering it.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: I could not believe my ears when the Chief Secretary to the Treasury said that over the last 14 years Britain's economic performance had improved. If that is the case, why are we talking about borrowing, and funding deficits? The Chief Secretary has fallen into the trap of believing his own rhetoric. Last week showed that the Government listen to themselves and nobody else, and live in a totally different world from the rest of Britain.

The tragedy of this Budget is that, once again, the burden has been put on those who can ill afford to pay. As the Chief Secretary said, we cannot look at allowances in isolation from the rest of the Chancellor's package. If we look at the burden imposed by the lack of action in relation to tax easement from the lower-paid, add to that such things as VAT, and then start to work out what inflation will be 12 months hence, we can see this tremendous burden unfold.

If I were the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, or any other member of the Government Front Bench, I would be ashamed to be a member of a party that, after 14 years, has brought a great country like ours to such a state that we have to borrow tremendous sums of money and raise money to pay it back.

One or two have to be answered. Two or three times today, hon. Members have alluded to these, and once again we have to take them up. The Chief Secretary, for example, referrred to issues that he must talk about that have arisen over the last 20 years. If we go back 20 years, we are talking about the Heath Government.

Has the Chief Secretary forgotten, when talking about industrial relations, the three-day week and the fact that prices rose considerably, particularly petroleum prices? The members of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries decided to put prices up, that led to inflation, and the 1974 Labour Government had to pick up the pieces. Let us remember a few facts when we talk about the improvement in Britain's economic position and start to compare records. I do not think that the Government have anything to be proud of.

The Chief Secretary talks about packages, and the Budget is a package, but nothing has been said during the debates or in anything that I have heard over the last few weeks about the balance of payments deficit. I wonder how much planning has gone into that. I wonder what taxes are in the pipeline for the future—or will it be higher interest rates, or perhaps a combination of the two?

Those are the things that the Government should start to think about, because we certainly do not want the stop-go situation again. The Government said 14 years ago that they would bring that sort of thing to an end. They were also elected on the slogan of lower taxation, but in reality we have had sneaky tax, hidden tax, and now taxation has been expanded through VAT. So, if they have not got on top of the deficit next year, will we see further expansion of VAT—for example, to newspapers, children's clothing, and so on?

Again, nothing has been done to help old-age pensioners or one-parent families. Instead, the burden on them has been increased.

That is a sorry indictment of this Government. They may try to find excuses, but the answer is that they have run out of alibis for their stewardship of this country over the last 14 years. The Chief Secretary must be very careful when he talks about improvements in Britain's economic performance, because the ordinary people in the street rejected his Government's policies last week. They are paying a terrible price for their tremendous efforts to put this country on its feet.

I welcome some of the initiatives to help businesses—I do not think that anybody who is concerned about unemployment could fail to do so—but we must ensure that small businesses get the benefits intended for them, and that sums of money in the form of grants are spent wisely.

This is a sorry Budget, a tragic Budget. The former Sir Geoffrey Howe's Budget in 1981 was supposed to set Britain in a new direction, on a new economic course, yet in 1993, we are looking at the same issues as we looked at in 1981. Those in the Government who call themselves accountants play ducks and drakes with figures, but the people of the country can do their homework; they can see the price that they have to pay for the follies of this Government. The Government may defend the highest 5 per cent., but we are very proud of the fact that we defend the lower-paid and people in the middle-income bracket.

The Government's recommendation must, I submit, be rejected tonight.

Dr. Berry: I had not intended to speak in this debate, but I want to respond briefly to a number of comments that have been made.

The proposal before us today is effectively to increase the tax burden on lower income groups, and we have been given some extraordinary reasons why this is appropriate. One extraordinary argument was that the tax burden had to be increased and it could not possibly be increased for those on higher incomes, who have benefited substantially from previous tax cuts.

Even good old Professor Laffer has been invoked, as if it is generally accepted that a little graph that the Professor scribbled on the back of a serviette in a restaurant in the United States a long time ago is somehow gospel and can be used to talk sensibly about tax policy.

I have to say that it cannot. The point is a very simple one. The argument rests on the proposition that, if we reduce people's taxes, they will work harder, so their incomes will be higher, and therefore they will pay more taxes. Ministers have given no evidence whatsoever that if, as has happened, the direct tax burden on higher income groups is reduced, they will work more overtime and consequently pay more income tax. The reason that they have not offered that evidence is that no such evidence exists. Exhaustive studies, not least by Professor C. V. Brown, have shown that income tax cuts on high income groups do not encourage greater efforts to pay even more income tax. It really is nonsense.

The Minister said that the budget deficit has to be corrected, but he did not recognise that it is so high precisely because of the Government's economic performance. I repeat my earlier point: that the Government have the worst record on economic growth of any post-war Government—1·9 per cent. per annum. The Government responded by saying, "No, you misunderstand. Living standards have improved".

Of course they have. If the Government had achieved the remarkable feat of negative growth, no doubt average living standards would have fallen, but even the present Government have managed to secure some economic growth over the past 14 years. It is the natural order of things. However, they have managed to reduce that rate of growth.

Living standards have improved for some people, because they have borrowed extensively in the financial regime created in the late 1980s. I advise the Government to worry as much, if not more, about the scale of private sector debt as they do about public sector debt. If they honestly believe that our economy is capable of sustaining increased living standards in the way that they have suggested, they are deluding themselves.

The clause is part of a tax package that in one sense is perfectly consistent with everything the Government have done. They have increased the tax burden over the past 14 years. It may be a useful device to tell people that they have not, but it is dishonest.

The Government have shifted the tax burden from the higher income groups to the lower. Not one person who has seriously examined the statistics would attempt to deny that charge. It is a charge, an accusation and a criticism. How can anyone conceivably support a tax regime that, year by year, is being geared to ensure that those on higher incomes get more and those on lower incomes get less?

Apparently, in order to encourage those on higher incomes to work harder, they have to pay less tax. Those on lower incomes are encouraged to work harder by paying more tax. That is the nonsense of the Government's position and I hope that the amendment will be supported in the Lobby.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The Minister told us about the regime that will operate, but he made no apologies for the fact that the wealthy people in Britain will become more wealthy as a result. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. Quite clearly, the Treasury had an opportunity to redress the balance and tax the rich people in Britain substantially more and reverse the trend that the Government have been applying for a long time.

I was amazed to hear the Minister's glib reply to me about how the Government frittered away billions of pounds of North sea oil revenue. I wonder what happened to North sea gas, as the gas from the Government is quite stinking. We have the sickest geriatric Government ever. They are so old-fashioned that they are not just getting grey hairs; they are dying on their feet.

Last week, the English and the Welsh consigned them to the bin and left them with just one council. That is no wonder, because they are utterly mismanaging the economy. There is no way they will get away with that anywhere in Great Britain. I would love the folk of Scotland to have an opportunity to register their protests, which would swing the boot at the Government. Perhaps the Government would then take a responsible attitude, instead of putting VAT on fuel and power, and at least folk would be able to live in a wee bit of comfort.

Will the Treasury Minister think about one issue that I have looked at recently? One of my constituents wrote to me and said, "Tommy, do you remember the hated poll tax, when the Minister came up with a rebate to get us out of the hole that we were in?" The people of Britain went bananas, they wanted rid of the poll tax.

Now the Government are committed to the council tax, and they have had to decide how to cover it. They increased VAT to 17·5 per cent. to provide an acceptable form of local government taxation because of the Government's absolutely massive blunder on local council finance.

The Treasury is producing these ways of balancing the revenue because they clearly got it wrong. They increased VAT to 17·5 per cent. VAT when the poll tax was abolished. Now the Minister expects elderly, disabled and unemployed people to pay 17·5 per cent. more for fuel and power.

I shall be glad to hear the Minister's reply in summing up. I find it amazing that VAT has been increased from 15 per cent. to 17·5 per cent. to cover the council tax. Now they expect 9 million elderly folk, 3 million unemployed folk and all the sick and disabled folk to pay extra. It is absolutely incredible. I am delighted to give way to the Minister.

Mr. Dorrell: I have summed up. I have certainly said all I have to say on the subject, but I should like to correct one wrong figure I used in my speech and in an intervention in that of the hon. Member for Perry Barr—and I apologise to him for that. I flattered the record both of the Government and our predecessors in terms of the effect on the real take-home pay of those on half average earnings. The figures should be that, between 1974 and 1979, those people saw their real take-home pay rise by just over £3 a week, and since 1979 by just over £25 a week.

Mr. Graham: When the Labour Government were in power, some folk in the House of Commons were still in primary school. I do not need a history lesson from any Minister. I remember the days when I started work. There was a Labour Government and I was employed in an apprenticeship. When I finished my apprenticeship, I went to work. I had a good job with good pay and could afford to go on holidays and buy my clothes: I definitely did not need to go to jumble sales and bag sales. That is what the Government have inflicted on the low-paid, the unemployed and the disabled. The Minister should come with me and see the result of his economic plan.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): Will my hon. Friend tell me how many charity shops there are in his constituency? If it is anything like mine, he will find that in the past five years the only expanding industry is charity shops. What is the situation in his constituency?

Mr. Graham: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. I can see the Minister's face getting whiter, but it is not as pale as some pensioners will be in the winter, when they cannot afford heating because of the Government's VAT policy.

My hon. Friend is right. In my area, there has been a tremendous boom in charity shops. The Government have cut charity funding so much that they have had to open shops while folk have a wee bit of money. It is not the wealthy people who make contributions to charity; it is folk like mothers, aunties, brothers and sisters who do not have a lot of money, but will not go by the tin can.

I make this point to the Minister, and I will make him an offer. I would love the whole Cabinet to come with me on those visits. It would probably help them to make a bit more sense of their taxation regime. I would love them to come to the jumble sales, the boot sales and the charity shops. I would like to take them on a Friday and Saturday night to some of the supermarkets, where they will see the elderly women scurrying about to try and buy goods which are near their sell-by date at half-price. They will see something that I never thought I would see again—the queues for the second-hand clothes and all the women scrabbling for something that costs 50p. That is what the Government taxation system has created for our folk; it has got them begging.

My offer is a sincere one. I notice that the local Conservatives in my constituency have jumble sales, and do very well. They occasionally go along and buy the boots that the lords have thrown in—or even Tory Members have thrown in. We do very well; we may buy a pair of boots for 50p that will give us a couple of weeks more wear. Then they announce in the local paper that the local Conservative fete made a few hundred pounds this week.

Then, in the next couple of weeks, we notice that they are asking local Conservative Members if they will donate old clothes—there is a great need for old clothes in my constituency—so that they can sell them to make a few bob in order to return a regime which imposes a taxation system on the low-paid and which cripples and kills the elderly behind their doors in winter.

Already the price of fuel—coal, gas and oil—is so high that pensioners are dying behind their doors. This is absolutely genuine—I am not conjuring up a fairy tale. I can see from all hon. Members' faces that they know I am telling the truth. The taxation system has been wrong for the last 14 years. For 14 years, the Government have plundered this country's resources; they have squandered the money raised by privatisation and thrown it into the bin—the dustbin of unemployment. They have wrecked the economy by squandering North sea oil and gas.

I only wish that we could have a general election tomorrow. I am sure that a general election tomorrow would not just produce a change of Government, but would enable the elderly folk, the disabled and the unemployed to walk with pride again. They could look forward to a future with jobs, to where the grass grows green and is not made dry and arid by this barren Government. They are a hopeless Government; they have had their day. Let us give them a real knuckleduster. If they are so confident of their tax regime, let us have a general election now.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: During the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham), I distinctly heard Conservative Members shout, "Tommy for Chancellor." I know that they are desperate to get rid of the present incumbent; nevertheless, I urge my hon. Friend not to cross the Floor to take over the job.

I also understand my hon. Friend's desire to take Conservative Members to charity shops, but he would probably get more for their suits than he would for their Government. I believe that the consumers in his constituency are a fairly discerning bunch: while they might purchase, at a knockdown price, suits that Conservative Members can clearly afford, I doubt that they would purchase a Government whom the country clearly cannot afford.

Let us not obscure the main point of today's debate—that the Government hope to raise an extra £2·7 billion in the financial year 1995-96. That is an awful lot of money. Of course the Government are trying to obscure the way in which it will be done; of course their proposals are not set out bluntly in the form of direct tax increases, as a number of my hon. Friends have pointed out. None the less, that will be the effect of the freezing of these allowances.

Interestingly enough—as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Dr. Berry) pointed out—the recession is affecting people with savings and people with private-sector debt in a similar way. Those with savings are trying to hold on to them, because they are frightened of spending and uncertain about their future. Labour believes that the only way to weather the present crisis is to deal with unemployment first: it is the core issue, and the Government should concentrate on it first.

Of course the public sector borrowing requirement, and indeed the revenues available to Government, are affected by growth rates. Of course, if the Government were able to restore economic growth to the point at which it should now be, more revenue would be available and they would be able to reduce the deficit. That, however, is not the history of recent years: we have experienced 10 successive quarters of negative economic growth. That affects not only the PSBR, but the tax burden required to service or even reduce it.

I agreed with the Financial Secretary when he cited the work of the Institute for Fiscal Studies about the distributional effect of the whole of the Chancellor's Budget—although, of course, that same distributional effect does not apply just to the details of the allowances that we are discussing.

However, although what the IFS said about the distributional effect of the totality of this year's measures was correct, that does not apply to the whole range of tax changes that the Government have made since 1979. The main change has been the substantial shift from direct to indirect taxation, particularly through VAT increases: that has had a regressive effect on the poor.

The Financial Secretary's favourite line seems to be that real take-home pay has increased throughout the Conservatives' period of office. They are proud of that. The hon. Gentleman, however, is talking about—I believe —58 per cent. of our fellow citizens, who are in work. What about the other 42 per cent.—the unemployed, and pensioners? What has happened to their real earnings since 1979? They have not been as well off under the measures promoted by the present Government.

If we take the lower rate band alongside the freezing of allowances, it is clear that those earning below median earnings will be adversely affected by the Government's proposals—not the very poor; not those who do not pay income tax, and therefore are not affected by the positioning of allowances in lower-rate bands; but those on low earnings. As if that were not enough, I believe that there is widespread public resentment about the way in which the Government have gone about raising the taxes they need in order to deal with the current deficit.

Before the election, we were told that the Conservative party was committed to reducing taxation; then, in the Budget, we are told that VAT must be extended to domestic electricity and to charities. That is probably the most regressive single VAT adjustment that could have been made. We are told that employees' national insurance must be increased, not just for those earning above average incomes—the Labour party's proposal before the general election—but for everyone. That was after the Conservative party promised at the election that they would do no such thing. Moreover, we now have the adjustment of allowances proposed in the Bill.

What is done is regressive. It is a substantial increase in tax—£2·7 billion. I do not think that the Financial Secretary has made the case against the amendment, so I urge hon. Members to vote for the amendment standing in my name.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 67

DONATIONS FROM COMPANIES AND INDIVIDUALS

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 46, line 14, leave out '£250' and insert '£200'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. John McWilliam): With this, it will be convenient also to discuss amendment No. 47, in page 46, line 17, leave out '£250' and insert '£200'.

Ms Harman: We have chosen the question of the tax treatment of charities for this debate for three reasons. First, the demands on charities are growing. Secondly, donations to charities are falling. Thirdly, the effect of the tax changes in the Budget will be that the Government themselves take more money in tax away from charities.

The demands on charities are growing, first, because of the cuts in social services, which mean that more people are having to turn to charities for services previously provided by local authorities and the health service, and, secondly, because of the growth in unemployment and the growth in debt. There are also demographic reasons—in particular, the growing number of elderly people.

There is a pattern to the development of charitable services which shows that where the welfare state is being cut back and where it is failing to meet the growing demand resulting from demographic trends, including the growing number of elderly people, charities are increasingly expected to step in and provide the services that I think in general most people would agree should be a basic part of the welfare state.

We support the work of charities and think that they are vital. That is why we have tabled amendments to this clause for debate. But what we do not think—and the charities are absolutely in agreement with us on this—is that the charities should replace the welfare state and take up basic services.

The role of the charities is very specific. I should like to give two examples of a particular role that they can play. In my constituency a club developed to provide day centre services for black elderly people. That was pioneering work. It was about developing a new way of providing services. It was a sort of gadfly role of the charities to show the social services that there was a different way in which they could provide such services.

There is also, for example, the work in relation to health services of organisations such as the Family Planning Association, where there has clearly been a need for services that have not been sufficiently provided by the mainstream health service.

So the demands on charities are growing, but increasingly the Government expect charities to step in and provide where the welfare state is retreating.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): May I pursue the hon. Lady's train of thought? Does she feel that, for example, the Macmillan nursing service and the hospice service—which we all know are a growth area, where so much is being poured in, because people want to do this work—should now be taken over by the state and administered by the state, or does she believe that they should go on? In Dorset we have just raised £3·5 million for our own hospice. That was a community effort; people wanted to do it on their own. Surely the hon. Lady is not suggesting that that should be taken over by the state.

Ms Harman: I think that the role that the hospice movement played was to show the national health service that there was a whole area of unmet need. The charities stepped in to meet that need. Increasingly, the demand has been that hospices, which are a vital service, should not simply be left to charities, but that the national health service should recognise that it has an important role in the care of the dying. That does not mean that the charities do not then have a role in relation to the terminally ill, because what they have done is provide services for the terminally ill at home; they have then moved their pioneering work into another area.

It seems to us that that is what the role of the charities should be—showing the way, developing new services, seeing what works. Then the social services and the national health service should learn from the work of the charities and move in. That is a very important role that the Macmillan nurses, the Crossroads care attendance scheme and the hospices, for example, have played.

If one talks to organisations such as the Crossroads care attendance scheme, they say "We've shown the need for these services. We have shown how they should be provided, but don't leave it to us to try to meet all this unmet need on a charitable basis."

At the same time as there is a growing demand for services, a demand that the social services and the health service are failing to meet, we have seen donations to charities falling, because of the recession. Because we are concerned about the work of charities, I was interested to hear the Chancellor say in his Budget statement on 16 March:

> "Since 1979, the Government have done an enormous amount to help charities . . . I now have two further changes to propose."

He announced proposals for increased tax relief on gift aid and payroll giving. He then said:

> "Taken together, they will boost tax relief on donations to charities by some £30 million in a full year."—[Official Report, 16 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 192.]

Those of us who were listening carefully to hear about the new measures for charities took that to mean that there would be an overall increase from the Treasury in assistance to charities. I am sure that my hon. Friends took it to mean that there would be increased assistance for charities.

I therefore looked in detail at the figures in the Red Book and at the figures in Treasury press releases. I also asked further written questions. When I received the answers, I was horrified to discover that there would not be an increase in tax assistance to charities as a result of the Budget. Quite the opposite is the case. The effect of the Budget proposals on charities will be to take money away from them.

I hope that the Paymaster General will admit that the impression that the Chancellor clearly intended to create —that there was extra help for charities in the Budget— was wholly misleading. There is no extra help for charities in the Budget. In fact, the Government will take more money from charities to help them to fill the growing hole in public finances. That is the first point that I look to the Paymaster General to answer. I hope that he will admit that the tax changes in the Budget, taken together, take more money from charities than they give back.

On the one hand, charities will gain from payroll giving and from gift aid. That is on the plus side of the charities' balance sheet under the Budget. On the minus side are VAT on fuel bills for charities and the reduction in the tax credits on dividends which are affected by the changes in advance corporation tax. We need to consider the effects of the changes over a period of three years, which is the best way to consider the matter. Whichever set of years we take, we find that charities will lose more than they gain. I am not trying to do some numerical trick here. It is fair to consider the effects over three years because the Government will phase in the ACT changes and the changes in VAT.

On the Government's own estimates—I ask the Paymaster General to confirm the figures—the charities will gain £83 million over the next three years as a result of the changes in payroll giving and in gift aid. That is the plus side on the charities' balance sheet under the Budget. On the minus side, on the Government's estimate, VAT on fuel will cost charities £60 million over the next three years. I am grateful for an answer to a parliamentary question which said that, in the first year, VAT will be £10 million and that in the second year it will be £25 million. I presume that it will be £25 million in the following year as well.

On the minus side of the charities' balance sheet is the tax credit on dividends and the effect of the changes in advance corporation tax. According to the Government's own estimates—again, I am grateful for an answer to a parliamentary question which arrived on 11 May—the loss to charities as a result of the ACT changes over the next three years will be £45 million. Over the next three years, the Budget will give charities £83 million, but over the same period it will take away £105 million.

The Paymaster General should apologise to the House for the misleading impression, which the Chancellor clearly intended to create, that the Budget would help charities. The charities will lose on the Government's own figures. The charities believe that they will lost out by more than £22 million in the Government's figures. The charities estimate that they are likely to lose out by more than £62 million as a result of the Budget. They believe that their losses as a result of the changes in advance corporation tax will be more than the £45 million over the next three years in the Government's estimates.

I know that the Paymaster General had a meeting with the Wellcome Trust about the issue. The trust has told me that it told him last week that it would lose £10 million as a result of the ACT changes because of the effect on its dividend income. The trust said that that would be 200 jobs gone in British universities. There is an important point here about medical research, much of which depends on dividend income. We look to charities to provide pioneering medical research; they also provide nurses to back up clinical research. The changes will affect not only posts in universities, but nurses and hospital beds.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I am the chairman of Marie Curie Cancer Care in my local area, so I am keen to ensure that the charity is encouraged to raise as much money as it can for the good work that the Marie Curie nurses do throughout Britain. Has the hon. Lady taken into account in the figures some of the money that will be distributed by the national lottery? It is estimated that more than £200 million will go to local charities. Has she also taken into account the changes since 1979? Despite the recession, which we all recognise, charities are in a far healthier state today than they were in 14 years ago.

Ms Harman: I hope that the Paymaster General will clarify for the House the point that the national lottery was supposed to be additional money. It was not supposed to be a national lottery that would finance charities which do the work that the welfare state should be doing but is no longer able to do. That is an important point.

The hon. Gentleman said that charities were now in a far healthier position. We and the charities do not think that they are in a healthy position. We do not want to move back to a time when basic welfare services were provided through individual donations because the Government had abdicated their responsibility to provide care for the vulnerable and the elderly in our society.

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): Is the hon. Lady misleading herself and, inadvertently, the Committee by not recognising the way in which funding from charities has been used over the years? With the readers of Woman's Own, I raised money for the bone marrow transplant unit at the Westminster children's hospital. That money came from individual, personal donations.

The national health service union at the time wanted to reject that £1·1 million because it was not public purse funding. That is the reality for charities that have endeavoured to step in. Because of the inbuilt horror of private funding, the NHS unions, for example, and others like them have tried to reject such funding. The Committee should think of how many children would have died if we had not managed to overcome that block.

Ms Harman: Whatever point the hon. Lady is making, it certainly has nothing to do with the point that I am making and bears no relationship to the case that I am arguing. I have been associated with many charitable appeals relating to social services and the health service. Appeals for extra cots for premature babies, extra research and so on have always asked people to help charities to raise money to plug the gap left by the Government's failure fully to fund our national health service.

7.30 pm

Ms Tessa Jowell (Dulwich): My hon. Friend shares with me the privilege of being a patron of the elimination of leukaemia fund which is based at King's College hospital. That charity has recently raised more than £200,000 to open a state-of-the-art leukaemia treatment suite at King's College hospital—an integrated part of that hospital. The sting in the tail came when the fund had to pay about £25,000 to meet the VAT requirement of the conversion. It is absolutely clear, not that there is any reluctance to receive charitable giving, but that there will soon be a reluctance from people who stand on windy street corners with collecting cans to raise money to make good what this Government have failed to do. People do not shake collecting cans to raise money for the VAT man.

Ms Harman: A great army of charitable workers are prepared to give hours of their time to raise money. There is a sense of justifiable resentment on two grounds. Not only are they raising money—the position will be made worse as a result of the Budget changes—to pay net contributions to the tax man; they will need to raise money because the Government are cutting back on services that many people believe should be provided by the welfare state.

Ironically, this blow will mean that many charities will have to cut their services to meet the VAT bills and compensate for the drop in income as a result of the ACT changes. Many of those charities are in areas formerly controlled by Conservative county councils because those councils failed to develop the necessary welfare services —they simply left it to the charities in those areas.

Barnardos say that the changes in the tax dividends credit will cost them £200,000 in lost income, the Royal National Lifeboat Institute says that it will cost it £250,000 and the Royal National Institute for the Blind says that it will cost it more than £100,000. As I said, the Wellcome Trust says that it will cost it more than £100 million. There is no doubt that the cut in income will mean that charities will have to pay the Chancellor £105 million over three years, together with the VAT on fuel.

Miss Emma Nicholson: It is kind and generous of the hon. Lady to give way to me twice—I appreciate it. I suggest that the figures which she has quoted with compassion and thoughtfulness reflect the top 400 charities. The figures for those charities are published by the Charities Aid Foundation. There are 185,000 charities in the United Kingdom and, therefore, the picture of charities that has been put forward by the hon. Lady is limited.

The charities referred to by the hon. Lady receive substantial central and local government funding. In other words, to suppose that the totality of Barnardos' income —a wonderful charity—comes from people shaking tins on windy street corners is nonsense. For many years, it has received more than 50 per cent. of its income from the Government. That gives a different picture when we talk about that charity giving back in value added tax in terms of central funding.

Does the hon. Lady agree that the projected figures that she quoted will not be correct because they reflect a tiny minority of the charities in the United Kingdom? The Government's effort on lowering the threshold on gift aid and the tax on payroll giving will enable further fund-raising to take place and, therefore, the incomes of charities will probably increase.

Ms Harman: I will not give way to the hon. Lady again because she has completely missed my point for the third time. I mentioned Barnados, the Royal National Institute for the Blind and the Wellcome Trust as illustrations—I was illustrating the Government's figures. The Government have not plucked their figures from the top ten charities. The figures are the Government's estimate of the effect of the changes on all charities. I note that the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) did not dispute those figures, and I hope that the Paymaster General will not dispute them. I remind him that the figures come from the Red Book, the Inland Revenue press release and written answers to parliamentary questions that I tabled.

Let us be absolutely clear. The figures are not simply projections from charities in general or the top ten charities; they are the Government's estimate of the amount that charities will lose as a direct result of the Budget measures. Over the next three years, the Chancellor will receive from charities £600 million from the VAT on fuel and £45 million from the changes to tax credits on dividends. Overall, the Chancellor will gain £105 million from all charities over the next three years.

I should be grateful if the Paymaster General could confirm those Government figures, although the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West, who has not looked at them clearly, disputed them. Charities believe that the Government's figure for the amount that they will lose on the ACT changes had been under-estimated—they think that they will lose much more. Of course, I have taken into account the phasing over the next three years.

As for the amount that charities will allegedly gain as a result of the Budget—the plus side of their balance sheets —the Government's answer to a parliamentary question was that the tax change for payroll giving would mean that charities will benefit to the tune of an extra £1 million a year. We then examine the Government's estimate that charities will gain as a result of the change to gift aid.

The Government estimate that the additional income on the changes to gift aid and its taxation treatment will be £80 million every three years—first £20 million, then £30 million and then £30 million. Even if one accepts those figures, charities will still lose about £22 million over three years. Charities think that that figure for gift aid is wildly optimistic.

A survey carried out by the Charities Aid Foundation shows that, between January 1991 and December 1992, 64 per cent. of charities experienced a real decrease in total income because of the recession, 67 per cent. reported a fall in new donations, and 61 per cent. said that there had been a fall in corporate donations. The income for charities from individual and company donations has fallen, yet the Government say that an £80 million tax credit will be available to charities as a result of the Budget change for gift aid. How do they work out that figure? They have assumed that there will be a spectacular increase in donations to charities from individuals and companies. It simply cannot be right that the Government can assume such an increase. Where is the evidence to justify that assumption? The evidence simply does not exist.

The charities do not believe that there will be an upsurge in charitable donations. If they are to benefit to the extent that the Paymaster General and the Government say from gift aid changes in the Budget, they must attract 45 per cent. more donations than last year. They cannot see how they will do that. Charities will have to receive £60 million more in donations of between £250 and £400 to attract the £20 million of extra tax relief in the Government's first estimate. Thereafter, they would have to receive an extra £90 million per year to attract the £30 million of relief next year and the year after in the Government's estimate. So when receipts from donations to charities have fallen, the Government offer an estimated benefit from gift aid, which has at its heart an assumption of huge increases next year, the year after and the year after that.

I hope that the Paymaster General will tell us how on earth he justifies what we regard as wildly over-optimistic figures for gift aid. Even if he is not prepared to accept that he has made an over-optimistic assessment—we believe that he should—he must not wriggle out of the argument that, even on his own figures, charities will lose significantly as a result of the Budget.

The work of charities is important. I would be important in any circumstances, but it is even more important when the Government are drawing back the welfare state and increasingly people are having to rely on charities. I hope that the Paymaster General will at least have the courage to admit that the Budget makes charities worse off. I hope that he will explain how he justifies making charities worse off in the next three years. I hope that he will also justify saying that charities will benefit to the extent that he says when the figures assume an increase in donations which charities simply cannot envisage in the next and ensuing years.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): It might be helpful if I intervene now and respond to any points made later in the debate if that is necessary. I am not sure whether it is strictly necessary for me to declare an interest. In a formal capacity as the Paymaster General, I am a trustee of the Royal Hospital Chelsea and hence of some of the related chairities. I am also treasurer of the Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation. I am also, in a personal capacity, trustee of a small charity which helps a children's clinic in east Jerusalem and of a church restoration charity. I hold a non-executive office in several other local charities.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) did not speak much about the clause. She widened the debate considerably. I shall first say a word about the clause and the amendment and then deal with some of the general points that she made.

The clause reduces the minimum limit for gifts to charities which qualify for tax relief under the gift aid scheme from £400 to £250 for gifts made by individual donors and close companies on or after 16 March 1993. I emphasise that date for reasons which will become apparent a little later in my remarks.

7.45 pm

The gift aid scheme was widely welcomed when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister introduced it in 1990 when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. It has already given substantial help to charities. The figures for the latest quarter have been published today. They show that during the tax year 1992-93 charities claimed tax relief repayments of some £73 million on gift aid donations of £218 million. That means that, over the whole period from October 1990 to the end of 1992-93, charities claimed tax repayments of £138 million on donations of £414 million.

As the House will be aware, the minimum donation was originally £600. It was then reduced to £400 and is now £250.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Does the Paymaster General have a breakdown of the figures for gift aid donations between charities? We have heard about the top 400 charities. Before I was elected to this place I was the director of a small charity. We had limited gift aid resources simply because the infrastructure needed to generate gift aid and payroll giving cost the charity money. That expenditure would have been speculative because we might not have obtained a return from it. I should be interested to know whether the wealth generated by gift aid and payroll giving schemes goes to the largest charities, which often do not need the money as much as the smaller charities in order to survive.

Sir John Cope: That is arguable, to say the least. The figures that I gave were for all charities of all sizes. I am afraid that I do not have a breakdown of them. It is not known how the figures break down between charities of different sizes. However, gift aid goes to charities of all sizes. Some small charities as well as large ones benefit. It depends to an extent on how much charities seek gift aid donations as opposed to other types of donation. Every charity has a different pattern of giving which it has built up historically and by which it lives.

The figures which the hon. Member for Peckham kindly gave the House were an estimated cost to the Exchequer as a result of the changes that we propose in the clause of £20 million this year and £30 million next year. I readily accept that that is not a precise estimate. The cost depends on the take-up of the relief by donors from year to year and on other factors. However, I hope that donors will take full advantage of the relief.

The hon. Member for Peckham implied that charities would need to receive £60 million more in donations to attract £20 million this year and an equivalent figure next year. But the relief will also apply to existing donations of £250 to £400 which might have been made in any case. So they would not necessarily all have to be new donations. They would be new to tax relief, but not necessarily new donations. The figure is not entirely inexplicable. I readily accept that it is an estimate. No one can be sure. We shall not be sure even when we see the figures at the end of the year exactly how much came from the Budget change. But that is the best estimate that our officials were able to make.

Sir Jim Spicer: The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) delighted in painting a doom and gloom scenario that was completely unjustified. Our new hospice, the small charity that I mentioned, had great difficulty in obtaining £600 donations. We then had a second crack at obtaining £400 donations. Now we are going out for the third time to obtain donations of £250 and we expect an enormous amount to flow in during this year. I should love to know how many hon. Members contribute through the payroll giving scheme, because I should have thought that there was considerable scope for an increase on that front alone.

Sir John Cope: I am not sure about other hon. Members, but I make a small payroll donation to one charity. Payroll giving relief has not been exploited as fully as it might have been. I hope that it will be developed more by charities in future, as my hon. Friend suggests. That would be a good thing because, as has been made clear —we shall come to this upstairs on clause 68—it is a small scheme in comparison with gift aid or other areas of tax relief in the amount of tax relief that it gives to charities, so it is capable of development from charities' point of view.

That makes the point that gift aid is only one of a range of measures. The amendment suggests that we should have brought the relief down to £200 instead of £250. The hon. Member for Peckham did not specifically address that in her remarks. But part of the reason why we did not is that we were anxious not to undermine regular giving by covenants and by the payroll giving scheme.

Many of the smaller charities to which the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) referred, such as churches, rely quite heavily on covenanted income. It gives them the assurance of a regular income, which they like from a planning point of view. Too large a reduction in the gift aid minimum donation could have had a substantial impact by reducing that income. That point has been made to us by the Charities Tax Reform Group among others and it is one that we took seriously.

That is why, when we examined the level of the minimum donation, we took the figure of £250 as providing a balance between encouraging more donors to take advantage of the gift aid scheme while at the same time safeguarding the interests of those charities that depend heavily on covenant income. Therefore, we do not recommend the amendment. However, the hon. Lady did not press it strongly, so she may have some sympathy with that part of my remarks.

The hon. Lady said that the role of charities was basically pioneering. I do not agree. That is part of the role of charities and it is a perfectly legitimate element of the activities of some charities, but many charities also have a continuing basis.

Charities cover a wide range of activities and are tremendously different. Some charities are large with big staffs and operations at home and overseas. Others are extremely small and run entirely by volunteers and the arrangement of their income differs a great deal. It is difficult to talk sometimes about charities except in terms of averages, which can be considerably misleading.

The hon. Lady accused my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer of being inaccurate or misleading in what he said in his Budget speech. But he was entirely accurate in what he said specifically about what has turned into this clause and clause 68, which was the passage that she read out, and also in what he said about advance corporation tax and charities in another part of his speech when he was talking about the changes that were being made at that point.

The hon. Lady also attempted a calculation based primarily on our figures in the Red Book and in answer to parliamentary questions to show the possible effect on charities of the Budget as a whole, taking the first three years. I hope that she will forgive me for pointing out that she was slightly inaccurate in the way that she put the figures together. On the giving side, as I said earlier, the provisions for relief on gifts apply immediately from the time of the Budget. The hon. Lady was correct in saying that we do not expect that payroll giving will involve more than about £1 million a year from the Exchequer and gift aid will be £20 million, £30 million and £30 million. That calculation was correct at £83 million.

However, I immediately add the caveat that I gave earlier. These are broad-brush estimates. I entirely accept that they are not and cannot in their nature be precise estimates of exactly what will happen. They are the best estimates of the likely effect of which I and my right hon. Friend have been advised.

The hon. Lady correctly identified the items that cost charities money, but she seemed to forget that VAT on fuel and power does not apply until next year and does not apply in full for two years. Dividends have a small implication this year. We estimate that it will be about £5 million on charities in 1993-94, £15 million in 1994-95 and £20 million in 1995-96. Again, that is a broad estimate, not a precise figure. I am not sure that we shall ever be able to give a precise figure in that respect.

If one accepts the estimate of VAT, the cost of that for charities is nil this year, 1993-94, because it does not apply at all, approximately £10 million in 1994-95 and £25 million in 1995-96. Those, taken together, total £75 million. The net effect of the Budget on charities during the first three years is a positive benefit of about £8 million. Therefore, the hon. Lady's point is not nearly as strong as she made it out to be. However, of course it is correct that there are items in the Budget that cost charities money, or reduce their income. We readily accept that that is the case and have acknowledged that throughout.

In part, it is true, too, that when we have reduced income tax the relief goes down. That has always been true. The traditional reliefs, as well as the gift aid and the other new reliefs that we have introduced, are less valuable if there is less income tax to refund to a charity on its income.

Nevertheless, because of the extra giving that has been encouraged, in part because of the extra money that people have in their pockets when they pay less income tax, for example, and because of the changes over the years, in 1979-80 direct tax relief for charities amounted to £175 million. In 1992-93, the year just gone, despite the reductions in income tax, and hence the reductions in money going in reliefs in that kind of way, the total had risen to £779 million in direct tax reliefs alone. There are also some special reliefs on VAT, both those that have been more recently introduced and those of longer standing. I do not believe that the reduction in income tax rates has damaged the income of charities.

These arguments are relevant when trying to calculate what the effects might be of Budget changes, including these changes. I believe that my right hon. Friend was right to introduce into his Budget the provision that is embodied in this clause. It was right to set the limit at £250 for gift aid and to make the payroll giving improvements which come under another clause. It would not be right, therefore, to accept the amendment.

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I agree with the amendment. The Government have made certain concessions, but they do not go far enough. Furthermore, the amendments do not go far enough. The gift aid and payroll giving concessions do not make up for the present shortfall, especially after the implementation on 1 April of community care. Many charities and voluntary organisations will have to pick up the pieces, because local authorities will no longer be able to provide various services. They will be unable to do so because the Government have not provided them with sufficient money to meet their community care commitments.

Charities will face tremendous problems in the present economic climate. People are in difficulties over giving money to charities. The result of unemployment in Rochdale and elsewhere in the country is that people are cutting back on their charitable giving. If there is an increase in gift aid and payroll giving, there is bound to be a decrease in other charitable giving. People have only so much money that they can afford to give to charities.

Charities do a worthwhile job. I have been the sponsor and patron of various charities for a number of years and I welcome the work that they do, but they should not do what health authorities and local authorities ought to be doing. For charities to receive an additional £30 million in gift aid, as the Government have suggested, would mean a staggering 83 per cent. increase in giving. No hon. Member can imagine for one moment that anyone will increase their giving by 83 per cent.

The change in the tax system introduced by the Budget will lead to charities receiving only 20p in the pound on investments. The Chancellor has admitted that over a number of years that will lead to a reduction of £50 million a year in dividend income. I have not plucked that figure out of the air, but that is not what the charities say: they say that their dividend income will probably be reduced by £100 million.

The Government's concessions will not meet the present shortfall. Charities are extremely worried about the future. I spoke this evening to representatives of one charity who fear the effects of a decrease in charitable giving. The hospice movement, which does a very good job, is in great difficulties. It is competing against other charities. I support my local hospice, but I am told that it will be unable to attract the amount of money that it needs because VAT on fuel and power will hit so hard. The fact that there is no VAT exemption for charities is despicable.

The Government say that they want to help charities, but they have done nothing to help them in this Budget. I hope that they will do more in the autumn statement than the feeble attempt that they have made to help charities in this Budget.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I welcome clause 67, which will lower the minimum limit for gift aid from £400 to £250. This is the second time in the short history of gift aid that the Government have sought to lower the limit. As my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has just told the Committee, gift aid has already proved itself to be a most valuable instrument for raising money on behalf of charities. This reform is a modest improvement to the scheme, but it needs to be seen in a larger context—the progressive development of fiscal support for charities throughout the life of this Government.

In 1980, Sir Geoffrey Howe doubled the capital transfer tax exemption on bequests to charities to £200,000. He also exempted charities from development land tax and reduced the minimum period for covenants from seven to four years. Year after year since then, in Budget after Budget, in Finance Bill after Finance Bill, we have seen the development of fiscal incentives and tax reliefs to encourage charitable giving and to support charities.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Did not Lord Howe also double VAT to 15 per cent. which, as the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) said, cannot be claimed back by charities and is a heavy burden upon them? Whatever the tax concessions given by the Government may be, was not the doubling of VAT to 15 per cent., and its extension to 17·5 per cent., a greater burden than any tax concessions by the Government could offset?

Mr. Howarth: It is true that VAT was raised substantially at that time, but the purpose was to enable income tax to be brought down. Lower levels of income tax have made a huge difference to people's capacity to make their own decisions as to how to spend their money. That is one of the reasons for the substantial growth in charitable giving in the past 14 years.

Sir Terence Higgins (Worthing): Is it not the case that when value added tax was first introduced it proved impracticable to give complete VAT relief to charities and in the early 1970s concessions were made to charities which were sufficient to offset that tax? Subsequently, time and again there have been further reliefs for charities. There cannot be the slightest doubt that if one took away all the concessions that have been made to offset the effect of VAT and got rid of the VAT problem itself, charities would be a great deal worse off. Is it not a fact that the measures taken to offset VAT are far more beneficial to charities in relation to the impact of VAT?

Mr. Howarth: My right hon. Friend speaks with particular authority on these matters. He was, indeed, the father of VAT—a title of which he is justly proud. I acknowledge the force of my right hon. Friend's argument.

Ms Lynne: According to the Government's statistics, there will be a loss of £22 million over the next three years. The figures provided by charities suggest that the loss will be even greater than that, so I do not understand the point made by the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir. T. Higgins).

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Lady diverts me from the development of my argument. If she will allow me to do so, I shall try to make progress. We shall no doubt return to this issue at a later stage of the debate.

What I hope to demonstrate is that the reforms, albeit modest, that the Budget makes in the interests of charities have to be set in the longer-term context. Under the 1983 Budget, the wages of staff seconded to work for charities were made allowable against tax for their employers. In 1984, tax relief on family cars which had been substantially adapted for use by disabled people was extended. In 1986, the tax treatment of close companies was reformed in the interests of charitable giving and payroll giving was introduced. The Bill marks the fifth occasion on which the Government have sought to develop and improve the payroll giving scheme. We have seen VAT concessions, such as that in 1989 on fund-raising events.

Taking all those measures and many others together, the value of charitable tax reliefs is now about £900 million. There is therefore no doubt whatever about the Government's commitment to support charities and the consistency with which the strategy has been developed. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister's personal commitment and his sensitive awareness of the needs of charities are well appreciated in the charitable world.

The history that I have briefly related has made eminently good sense. It is appropriate that a Conservative Government should nurture a tradition of charitable giving which dates back at least to the Elizabethan Statute of Uses of 1601. Government have an indispensable, bedrock role in the relief of poverty and in the provision of care for people in need, but it is essential that we also build local and personal responsibility, that we mobilise the generosity of society and that we encourage the better parts of human nature.

In the words of Sir William Beveridge in 1942, what is needed is a "comprehensive policy of social progress."

Beveridge always preferred to talk in terms not of a welfare state but of a welfare society, and it is always necessary to improve both the welfare state and the welfare society. They are part of each other. It is always necessary to think anew about how we can better match the resources of society to the developing challenges that we face. I put it to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) that state bureaucracies are a necessary but insufficient means to this end.

Let us recollect that the origins of the welfare state are twofold. It derives from 19th century paternalism and from 20th century egalitarianism. Its origins are political and its manner of operation is bureaucratic. It is magnificent, but it is limited. It is powerful, but it is inevitably crude. People's needs vary infinitely. No one's needs conform to any standard and the problems of individuals are not susceptible to remedy by standard means. The state must provide basic guarantees—indeed, it must provide more than basic guarantees—but charities are an essential complement to the state. I was sorry that the hon. Member for Peckham was unwilling to see charities in that role. She spoke of charities as gadflies and as pioneering. She is right on both points, of course, but I should like her to acknowledge that charities are indispensable and valuable permanent partners to the state in its undertakings.

Charities, after all, have qualities that I would term entrepreneurial. The hon. Lady may feel that that is a term imported from an alien culture and that it is inappropriate. But at their best, charities are motivated to find out and meet demand, and to respond to changing needs. They work from the bottom up, not from the top down. They have a depth of local knowledge and a sensitivity to local circumstances. They are animated by the enthusiasm of their staff and their voluntary workers and not by direction from on high in big organisations. They sit loosely to convention. They are willing to experiment and innovate. They are energetic. They have a delicacy and a precision that the broad brush of bureaucratic provision inevitably lacks. They respond to individual needs and not to the abstractions of policy.

I do not mean to idealise charities. Too many charities are hidebound, timid, amateur and incompetent, but the best are creative in the senses that I have described and we need them more than ever. Clause 67 is right and necessary because it builds on the support that the Government have given to charities.

Charitable and voluntary work meets the needs not only of the recipients but of the givers. To help one's fellow men and women has a profound appeal to many people. I think, for example, of retired people looking for outlets for their energies and talents. I think of those for whom the ordinary routines of getting and spending are simply not sufficiently satisfying in their personal lives. I think, too, of unemployed people, and in this regard this week's Incomes Data Services report offers us all matter for reflection.

8.15 pm

It is, of course, very encouraging that unemployment among women had fallen to about 5.6 per cent. at the start of the year. But unemployment among men remains high at 14.1 per cent. We cannot realistically hope that the gap will quickly close, and the important challenge to policy makers is to help those men find a role in our society. Through voluntary work, many people can feel needed, they can contribute and they can recover a sense of belonging. Through voluntary work, their self-esteem and self-confidence can be restored. They can develop practical skills, after which they will find new opportunities for themselves.

I agree very much with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who said in a speech at the beginning of February:

"I believe we must do more to recognise, support and encourage the habit of volunteering, which cements together our society and is one of the great glories of our national life."

That means strengthening volunteer bureaux such as the excellent one in Stratford-on-Avon, and although it is a delicate and sensitive task for Government, they must do what they can to assist the development of neighbourhood networks of volunteering. If we can do that, we shall provide opportunity for many people for whom we ought to find opportunity, and we shall strengthen the bonds of our society. It is interesting to note that, a month after my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's speech, President Clinton announced his scheme for national voluntary service in the United States.

On 2 March, I asked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister whether the Government would "look systematically to identify and eliminate obstacles which at present discourage voluntary work and charitable activity, including aspects of eligibility for both unemployment benefit and invalidity benefit". [Official Report, 2 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 135.]

Shortly after that, I was glad to be one of the sponsors of an all-party early-day motion, No. 1597, which asks the Government to change the availability-for-work regulations to allow a volunteer seven days in which to give up a voluntary position, to alter the regulations for out-of-pocket expenses, to allow unemployed people to attend voluntary work camps throughout the European Community as well as in the United Kingdom, and to require those who advise benefits claimants to use discretion to encourage volunteering and not to limit it.

I do not have in mind—nor, I believe, do the other signatories to the motion—a scheme of compulsory workfare. What we are thinking of is encouraging those who want to give back to society in exchange for the support that they have received. I put it to my right hon. Friend the Minister that that is complementary in its spirit to the citizens charter, which properly insists on the rights of individuals. We need equally new emphasis on the obligations of the citizen.

In reality, we have no option but to proceed towards decentralisation, to diversification, to partnership and to enhancement of the role of voluntary work and charities. The age of centralised bureaucratic government is passing. We live in a society in which information is disseminated instantly and in which our citizens are educated, confident and insist on their independence. In any case, we are driven in this direction by a fiscal imperative: it is no longer possible, if ever it was, for Government simply to raise more and spend more.

We are all aware at the same time of the growing demands in our society for better quality services and for new varieties of services, such as the hospices that my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, West (Sir J. Spicer) mentioned. We therefore have no option but to find new ways of meeting social need. The role of Government is to mobilise the resources of society, to empower and to provide incentives.

In that process, I have no doubt that local government must play a major part and must be welcomed in its role. If we ask for neighbourliness we must certainly respect and encourage the sense of local community. For the purposes of my argument it does not matter whether local government is controlled by the Conservative party, the Labour party or the Liberal Democratic party, but I am sure that we need flourishing local communities able to express themselves and to pursue their aspirations through the institutions of local government.

That sense of local community will be expressed not only through local government but through an abundance of local voluntary organisations and local enterprises all working in partnership. What I advocate certainly does not entail any abandonment of responsibility by central Government, who should use their leverage to shape local and private decisions so as to enable us better to pursue our social goals.

Much of what I have described is already happening. Care in the community is a conspicuous instance. The Government have been right to entrust the lead responsibility for care in the community to local authority social services departments, but it is also right that social services departments should not seek to do everything directly themselves through bureaucratic provision. Central and local government are taking charities into a new and much more formal partnership in social provision. That makes it incumbent upon us to think clearly about the role of charities and about what the impact on them of this new dispensation may be.

For example, before 1 April 1993, residential care was frequently provided by charities and paid for by residents subsidised by public funds from the Department of Social Security. Since that date, when funding was transferred from the Department to local authorities, charities have been contracted to become part of a publicly provided service. I accept that change, but let us be clear that it is a change of profound and far-reaching importance to charities. We will need to observe carefully the impact of the new dispensation on the nature of charitable activity and motivation.

That makes it all the more important to distinguish between funding charities through grant or fee to perform contractual functions, and supporting charities through fiscal relief to enable them to use their own initiative for the betterment of society. Both those roles for charities are essential. However, the latter—the encouragement of charities to use their own initiative and entrepreneurial energy for the betterment of society—needs sensitive consideration, given the difficult financial climate that they have had to face. The difficulties are well documented in the Charities Aid Foundation report, "Charities in Recession".

As other hon. Members have said, during the recession there has been a decline in voluntary giving and a falling away of the income of charities. Public expenditure constraints have meant that local authorities are less well placed to direct funds towards charities. We must also consider what the impact of the Government's decision on the urban programme may be. There are further uncertainties about the future of city challenge. I hope that city challenge will have an important part to play in future policy because it seems to be one of the most creative means of mobilising the resources of the community that we have yet seen deployed in this country.

I welcome the clause, and the proposed improvements to the gift aid scheme and to payroll giving. There is an argument, to which my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General referred, that if the limit of gift aid is reduced there will probably be a falling off in the number of covenants made. That is a valid fear, but it is also fair to note that for many years charities lobbied for what was called the single-year covenant, so perhaps they do not have absolute grounds for complaint.

I have to say—and I say it with sadness—that on balance this Budget disadvantages charities. It might be said that that is no great surprise. Charities are a huge presence in our national life and in our economy. In 1990, there were 171,434 registered charities with income in the order of £17 billion or more than 3 per cent. of gross domestic product. Charities employ at least 200,000 paid staff and there are about 1 million charitable trustees in our society. Perhaps, therefore, it is inevitable that, in a year when the Government are bound to raise taxes, charities will have to bear some of the brunt. Indeed, it would be difficult to exempt them entirely. All the same, I greatly regret the fact that charities are being asked to face an increased VAT burden, and I regret that the impact of the change in advance corporation tax, notwithstanding the transitional relief, seem certain to be so detrimental.

I ask the Government to stand back and consider the overall, net impact of their policies. It is worth asking whether, even at a time when general taxation has to increase, it is appropriate to increase the burden of taxes on charities. Charities should not be compared with private individuals or companies. As I have said, the Government are asking them to play an increased role in social provision. For all the reasons that I have sought to explain, the Government need charities, and my right hon. Friends should consider carefully the consequences of simultaneously reducing the resources available to them.

We must contemplate not only the measures in the Bill but, for example, the impact of the council tax on certain charities. Most residential homes run by charities have in the past been exempt from rates, but charities are not entitled to an exemption from the property element which represents 50 per cent. of the council tax. Transitional relief is being provided, but the Leonard Cheshire Foundation estimates that after the transition the change will cost it £210,000 a year. That aspect of the council tax will also be a disincentive to charities to subdivide their larger homes into smaller, homelier residential units, which would otherwise be desirable for care in the community.

We must also bear in mind the impact of the national lottery, which will inevitably divert some money from charitable giving. Although it is not properly the subject of today's debate, I hope that my right hon. Friend will be willing to contemplate an amendment to the Bill so that instead of a 12 per cent. tax being imposed on lottery ticket sales, winnings would be taxed so as to enable a larger proportion of the money spent on the lottery to go to good causes.

It is important to examine the overall impact on the charitable sector of the policies simultaneously being pursued by the Government.

I would not vote for the amendment and I am not even sure whether the hon. Member for Peckham will invite me to do so. None the less, it has provided a useful opportunity for debate, although we all know that, if carried, its practical effect would be relatively trivial in the context of the larger issues that we have discussed.

I ask my right hon. Friends in government to develop in the range of their policy making a clearer and more consistent concept of what they are asking of charities, and to ensure that an appropriate range of supportive fiscal policies is in place.

8.30 pm

Miss Emma Nicholson: My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) made a splendid, wide-ranging speech about the impact of charities on people who give, on people who help and on people who receive help. That veritable tour de force by the chairman of the all-party group on charities was a wonderful speech to listen to and I am grateful to be allowed to follow it, although I shall employ a slightly different mode of thinking.

We are debating how charities are funded and where the funds are found. As a derivative of that discussion, we have strayed into the subject of what work charities perform. We have also talked a little about what we believe charities should contribute to our society's social welfare and educational structure. The two small planks on which the whole discussion has been built are the ways of giving to charity—gift aid and payroll giving. I refer to them as small planks because the enormity of charitable giving outstrips them by far.

I am glad that a number of hon. Members have commented on various ways of giving. I stress that payroll giving can never be the largest source of income for a charity. Opposition Members who have talked about payroll giving as if it were something that could transform a charity's income may have been misleading themselves. That was never the intention.

Payroll giving was started in 1947 by a Jewish charity called Children and Youth Aliyah—the British arm of a Zionist movement. The charity was set up to raise funds to settle Jewish children from various countries in Israel. It was formed by people who had small factories. In order to get their staff and their families—these were often family businesses—to contribute, payroll deductions were started.

There was a link-up with the Save the Children Fund at about that time and the two charities ran the scheme together. For many years they were the only charities to do this. It was a combined operation. Why only two charities? Because it is a very labour-intensive scheme to run. A very large number of people are being asked for small sums of money. To make payroll giving effective at that time, a factory's entire work force had to agree to give. Otherwise it would not have been worth the effort of the payroll clerks, cost accountants and finance directors. This was a very difficult type of fund-raising to run. It depended heavily on organisers going in and persuading people on the shop floor to give.

Now that the Government have stepped in, the situation is much easier. Payroll giving has been transformed into an eminently possible source of funding, albeit still on a relatively small scale. It is on a small scale because people are being invited to contribute regularly from their pay. They have to make a personal commitment. However, the system is infinitely easier now that the Government have stepped in and made it possible to do things which we in the Save the Children Fund did with such difficulty for so many years.

Gift aid is wonderful, but it will never be the largest source of charitable giving. By far the largest source of charitable giving in this country is events to raise money. Indeed, I hate to tell hon. Members that the preferred United Kingdom means of raising funds is jumble sales. People love to give a little while they enjoy some activity. British people give with a sense of fun and merriment to causes that meet needs which are sometimes of deep social and personal significance. This is particularly true of overseas causes.

Some years ago the classic model of a charitable giver was a middle-aged lady—a churchgoer or someone who attended the synagogue regularly or went to the mosque. One would encounter a high proportion of widowed people and quite a high proportion of professional people. Those who went to church tended to give to one special charity, with two runners-up; those who went to the synagogue gave regularly to 25 charities; those who went to the mosque were involved in quite a wide spread of charitable giving.

I do not wish to attribute to the Government a greater impact upon the charity world than has taken place, but, from my own substantial experience in this field, I have to suggest that the Government have transformed the donor profile. Consider Comic Relief and the way in which younger people are now contributing so much more. There is a wider variety of options for giving, and this year's Budget reflects two small but significant methods that the Government have pioneered. A much broader section of the population is now involved in charitable giving.

Contrary to what several Opposition Members have said, the United Kingdom is exceptionally generous in its giving. The generosity is shown both by individuals and by the Government. We are tenth in the league of donors internationally, and as individuals we are second or third. Britain has always been a profoundly generous nation. It has always been generous to people in need, both at home and overseas. In the recession the income of some charities has indeed gone down, but it should be borne in mind that the income of some has increased. That applies to many overseas aid organisations.

It is not too far-fetched to suggest that British givers put their money where they see the greatest need. Perhaps they have not been giving quite so generously to some charities that operate in the domestic field as they are aware of the greater state provision. Despite all the talk about cuts, I am aware that some national health service figures are going through the ceiling. The same thing applies to social services provision—what Opposition Members refer to as the welfare state. Is it possible that British donors believe that their money is better targeted to areas where there is little or no state provision? Is it possible that they wish to leave to the state those areas where the state is making full, rich and complex provision?

It is difficult for the Opposition—particularly for the Labour party, with its desire for total state provision—to accept that charities have a real and continuing part to play. I do not for one moment doubt the generosity of many individual Opposition Members. Indeed, some of them have assisted my own small initiatives to help the helpless. I know how tough the situation is. Opposition Members talk about a pioneering role for charities. A pioneering role is one thing, but the continuation of provision is surely also a proper function of charities in our most modern of welfare states. There are many actions in which the state should not get involved.

Take Relate as an example. People who are helped by that organisation do not say that the Government should take it over, that provision should be made by the state, and that the welfare state should be tampering with their marital breakdowns or personal-relationship difficulties. What the public ask is that the Government continue to fund Relate generously and regularly so that this voluntary, or quasi-voluntary, organisation may continue its work. I am referring not to its pioneering work but to its continuing work. Meals on Wheels is much more old-fashioned, but is still valuable. The Government fund it, but nobody suggests that they should take it over and deliver the meals, depriving people of the love and care that come with the service.

I suggest that charities have a continuing role, woven into the weft and warp of our social services and our health and education provision.

I am one of the two founders of a charity called Cities in Schools. It is an odd title which came about because Mrs. Carter read it back to front; it was meant to be "Schools in Cities". It is a new initiative, based on a United States model which we have converted to a United Kingdom perspective. It is non-political, as is proper for charitable efforts, and targets truancy.

I do not believe that we will have a pioneering role which will enable us to work ourselves out of a job. We are helping children back into mainstream education in Cardiff, Bethnal Green, Tower Hamlets and other places. Our uniqueness is that we are not a Government body but a voluntary organisation. Cities in Schools involves a mixture of volunteering, enthusiasm and professionalism, and is backed by the local community, the educational system and local businesses.

That brings me to another point about charitable giving. It is measurable not just in money, although that is a terrible thing to say with the Financial Secretary sitting in front of me. Cash is an enabler, but there are other forms of giving. Burger King assists Cities in Schools in the provision of buildings. Other companies give major gifts in expertise, management and work experience. The Opposition do not much like business involvement in charities, but that is the way to turn young lives away from truancy and bring them back into the main stream. Why do I think that our work will continue? Because I do not believe that truancy will stop tomorrow or that the heavy hand of the state can have the same effect on those youngsters as we can.

Charitable effort is a continuation of the work that so many of our forebears did historically before the welfare state came into existence. The United Kingdom has a wonderful inheritance of charitable work. We heard a reference to 171,000-plus registered charities, but there must be just as many which are not registered and which carry on a great deal of work. Many of them are very small and have no staff. Many are funded completely voluntarily and do not obtain money from Government.

How very different their perspective is from that of the larger charities, the top 400, which are so often quoted as the charitable world because the Charities Aid Foundation takes their income, expenditure and style of activity as the norm. It is not the norm. Their expenditure on advertising, salaries and cars, for example, is beyond the norm. Most charities are run very economically and are very much smaller. In most cases their efforts are overlooked.

We have strayed a long way in the debate from gift aid and payroll giving, but that straying has been thoughtful and should encourage the Government to continue thinking of ways to assist the work of voluntary organisation. I make no apology for talking around the profile of the giver and the way in which the work of charities enlarges the work of the state. Those points were raised by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) in her criticism of the initiative by the Government. It is right and proper that we should respond to her.

I pay tribute to the great generosity of the British people in their giving. I thank the Government for the many ways in which they have made giving more attractive for donors in recent years. In the past couple of years, I have raised £3 million to £4 million and I never fail to be astonished at the imagination and sensitivity of people in recognising need and in giving time, professionalism, expertise and money. Again I thank the Government for making it easier for donors to be generous.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 67 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 115

FIRST YEAR ALLOWANCES: MACHINERY AND PLANT

8.45 pm

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I beg to move amendment No. 37, page 84, line 15, leave out 'subsection', and insert 'subsections'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. John McWilliam): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 38, in page 84, line 23, at end insert—

'"(3C) This section applies to so much of any expenditure as is incurred by a person carrying on a trade, on the provision of a ship.".'.

May I remind the Committee, because it is a Committee, that charity is finished with and that the Chair resumes normal service? Hon. Members must speak to the amendments before the Committee.

Sir Giles Shaw: The amendment is not unworthy. On the contrary, those who have taken an interest in the extremely gloomy and prolonged decline in the British marine fleet and the shipping industry are bringing the issue correctly to the centre of the Government's policy making, which is the Budget. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is in his place because these issues must be addressed carefully, urgently and in a constructive and effective way.

It is common knowledge in the Committee that the decline in the shipping industry has been profound. The purpose of tabling the amendment was, first, that the industry is in a parlous position and requires specific action. Secondly, it is to increase capital allowances to 100 per cent. so that there may be some encouragement for the building and replacement of ships. Thirdly, through my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, I point out to the Government and particularly the Department of Trade and Industry that time is fast running out, and that unless the Government act in fairly short order it will be too late to make any constructive and long-lasting change to the irreparable decline.

As to the shipping industry itself, the United Kingdom maritime fleet is No. 33 on the world list. That of itself is a miserable statement. I understand that on the latest register there are only 425 vessels, with a gross registered tonnage of only 3·4 million tonnes. The decline has been steady, protracted and virtually unerring in ratio, so that one can reasonably plot that by 2010 the British shipping industry will have disappeared. It was because of that order of magnitude of decline that we decided to table the amendment. It is essential that action is taken now. That is particularly so when the demand for shipping is growing at 4 per cent. per annum. One cannot complain that there is not a market in which to compete and a need for good, efficient and effective shipping.

The need for a British shipping industry has been firmly established; no words of mine are needed to add to the good causes which we should now pray in aid. It is essential for a trading nation to have an effective shipping and marine industry. It is essential for an international trading nation to have it on a scale that allows international competition to be met. It is essential for a nation that has significant overseas committments and has had the capacity in recent times to require logistic support for defence needs to maintain that capacity.

The second area of need relates to the fact that the British marine shipping industry and ships are now aging rapidly. The average age of British ships is about 16 years. With that increased life comes not only the need to repair and restore, but increased inefficiency. Modern technology being what it is, it is now posible to find engines which are much more effective, run on less fuel, provide more power and are more mobile and useful in every possible way. So with the decline and ageing come higher costs through inefficient operating levels. Thus it is that, according to the Chamber of Shipping, it is a requirement that some three quarters of the British fleet be replaced by the year 2000. The need is established in fairly clear terms.

The requirement of replacment brings with it a consequential benefit for British shipbuilders. I need hardly remind my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, on a day which has seen a question and answer on the subject of Swan Hunter, of the vital importance of providing for increased orders for shipbuilders. Certainly, at least half the orders required to modernise the fleet up to the standards required will be placed with British suppliers.

Having set out the need and the background of decline, let me come to the specifics. What should be done? My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will note that the amendment deals with capital allowance—a well-accepted system, widely practised and clearly a Government favourite, because in the Budget there is increased provision for capital allowance for industrial investment. There is no doubt that this is, in the Government's view, a satisfactory mechanism through which to deal with investment, and investment in the industry is certainly required.

It therefore does not seem illogical that, if there is an industry that needs special care and attention—not charity, but special care and attention—the instrument of capital allowance is a reasonable one to select. That is the purpose of the amendment. The Government are committed to produce, through this Budget, a budget for industry. The British shipping industry, which is surely within that compass, also requires special care and attention.

Over the years, the Government have been extremely generous in providing a wide range of assistances—if I can use that word—to various industries. If businesses come from outside this country, grants are available if they locate in certain places. Regional grants are available in some areas and in areas of decline substantial grants are available through various measures introduced by the Government and applied through the Treasury or the Department of the Environment. Regional aid, relocation grants and development grants come into this. There is the Urban Development Corporation, for example, introduced to provide special initiatives using Government funds to help establish new industries.

There are also enterprise zones, introduced, as I recall it, to provide a zone in which there would be significant tax relief for the establishment of certain industries. On the grand scale, this Government, as many predecessors on both sides of the Committee would agree, have been hugely supportive of agriculture and of major public industries, into which the coal industry assuredly fits, with the massive support that it has enjoyed over the years in connection with its indebtedness.

So there is no shortage of information that leads us to believe that the Government have looked at industrial problems and used taxpayers' money to help relieve them.

It is against that background, therefore, that I claim that the amendment is relevant to the kind of policy that the Government should be adopting at this time for the industries which they select. If there is to be a significant improvement in the profile for British shipping, it is vital that the Government find the appropriate mechanism to ensure just that.

One idea that the industry has is the creation of a maritime enterprise zone in which a scheme would be provided which might be attractive to my hon. Friend because it would be ring-fenced. He often finds that simple additions of aid or altering the tax allowance on the capital grant is difficult to operate. The maritime enterprise zone, however, would be unique to the needs of British shipping and could provide a formula worth looking at and applying.

If, through the capital investment proposal that we lay before the Committee or the maritime zone, there were a significant improvement in the industry's prospects, what benefit would that bring? The answer is significant economic return. There is little doubt that the amendment, if applied, could, according to the Chamber of Shipping, stabilise the position of the fleet within five years. And, if it were accompanied by investment over a period of time in new and more effective and competitive ships, the fleet could be stabilised in five years and the average age could probably be reduced from 16 to 10 years. Over 10 years, perhaps, the fleet could be increased by some 40 per cent. by volume.

All this would bring huge benefits to our economy. Overseas trading and earnings and the international commitment to shipping which this country has for generations established would grow and with them the marine engineering industries and many related industries would flourish.

The case is made out for taking some action to assist the industry at a point at which it would appear to be entering a phase of decline that will be terminal unless action is taken.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the estimate of the British Chamber of Shipping that unless the Government take urgent action there will be no merchant fleet left by the time of the next general election?

Sir Giles Shaw: Had the hon. Lady heard my opening remarks, she would have heard me say that by the year 2000 the merchant fleet will have declined to virtually nothing.

Ideally, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept the amendment for action now as it would be consistent with the mechanism of the investment allowance and the measures in the Budget for industrial investment in general. If my hon. Friend is not so minded, I press him to consider the matter and, with the agreement of the industry, work out a plan which, in his eyes, will be effective to do the job, because it has to be done.

If simple allowances are not satisfactory, we must come back to the House with a scheme that will provide for recovery, refurbishment and reinvestment to produce a greater, more competitive and more efficient maritime service than that which we presently enjoy.

The clause is of real and crucial importance to the industry, which does not in its own right require any charitable treatment, but which is a quintessential industry. It is one of the few industries that one can isolate and say that an island nation demands an adequate, properly staffed and efficient merchant marine.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): I support the amendments because they will help the shipping industry and the shipbuilding industry. I should like to concentrate on their possible impact on the shipbuilding industry.

The economic arguments in favour of the amendments are convincing and the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) put them effectively. He referred to many strong economic and commercial arguments in favour of the clauses, and I shall not detain the Committee by repeating them.

I was not in the Chamber at the beginning of the hon. Gentleman's speech, and I apologise for that, but I assume that he has also made the strategic case for increasing the size of the United Kingdom merchant fleet, which has a significant role in commercial activities and in the security and defence of the nation.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the significance of the shipping industry to the commercial health of the nation. The Committee should be aware of the major contribution that the industry has made over many years. However, in the past five or six years the situation has become extremely serious. The number of United Kingdom registered ships has halved in the past seven years and our merchant fleet now ranks 33rd in the world, behind countries such as Cyprus and the Bahamas, as hon. Members will be surprised to discover. That is serious for Britain's strategic place as a maritime nation that relies heavily on the activities of its merchant fleet.

I want to mention the importance of these measures to the health of Britain's shipbuilding industry. In the past few days, there has been a major threat to one of the finest shipyards in the country. It is incumbent on the Government to take a strategic overview of Britain's shipbuilding industry.

The hon. Member for Pudsey drew attention to the importance of renewing Britain's merchant fleet. I speak for all my hon. Friends when I say that that is an urgent imperative.

It is no longer an option for the Government to do nothing about what is happening to our maritime industry. As a country we depend on our maritime industry, in particular the British shipbuilding industry, which has been decimated in the past three years by the Government's failure to consider the importance of those industries to the health or the nation.

I find it depressing when Conservative Members, although there are not many present tonight, talk about the shipbuilding industry as representing yesterday's technology. That is a completely bogus contention. I invite any Conservative Member who wants to experience at first hand the strength of the technological base of Britain's shipbuilding industry to come to my constituency and see the investment that has been made in the shipyard in Barrow and the quality of the engineering work that is carried out.

There is evidence of that high-quality work in every shipyard in the country, on the Clyde and on the Tyne. If hon. Members want to see the quality of the work on the Tyne, they had better get there quickly, because the decisions that the Government have taken have left the shipbuilding workers on the Tyne cruelly exposed to a decimating future of unemployment.

I should like a sign that Conservative Members will show some imagination, which is rather a lot to expect from some of them, about the growing scale of the problem faced by many shipbuilding workers who have served the nation incredibly well over many years and deserve better.

The shipbuilding industry, in particular, looks to the Government to give some indication that they are aware not only of the contribution that the industry has made in the past, but of the contribution that it can and should be allowed to make in the future. The merchant fleet lies at the core of the argument. We accept that the volume of naval work will inevitably decline, but the same cannot be said of our Merchant Navy.

Although we face stiff competition from the far east and the Pacific rim—with which we need to deal—we should not simply throw up our hands and say that we can make no decision to help the British shipbuilding industry to survive into the next century. We can make such decisions, but we must recognise that inaction is not an option: failure to act would decimate employment opportunities all over the country.

The hon. Member for Pudsey spoke of the importance of the merchant fleet, and rightly drew our attention to the increasing age of that fleet. The average age of British merchant vessels is now over 16 years. The need for replacements is urgent, and the best way of providing them is to place orders with British shipyards. Perhaps the most excellent contribution that our British shipyards can make is in the design and building of clever, high-tech cargo vessels—vessels that will be needed in the future to carry specialised products around the world. The hon. Member for Pudsey mentioned the expectation that world trade will continue to increase. We need to ensure that British shipbuilding, and the British shipping industry, can contribute to and share in that increase.

I urge the Committee to support the amendment, on which I hope we shall be able to vote. We need to test the backing of the Committee not only for the future of Britain's shipping industry—which has made a strong contribution to the commercial health of the nation over many decades—but for the desperate need to alleviate the chronic mass unemployment that now affects many shipbuilding communities.

Sir Terence Higgins: I spent the first seven years of my working life in the shipping industry, and qualified as a member of the Institute of Chartered Shipbrokers. At that time, the British shipping industry was at the forefront of world trade in terms of both liner trade and tramp shipping. Since then, there have been massive technological changes in the form of roll-on/roll-off ships, the development of container vessels and so forth; but—alas—there has also been a huge decline in the size of the British register and the scale of British shipowning.

I believe that, at an early stage, British ship owners were too confident of their own abilities. They thought that they could compete regardless of whether other countries' owners were receiving huge subsidies from their Governments. That went on for some time, and the British register declined. By the time British ship owners had realised that they could not win such an unfair contest, it had become difficult to obtain Government support.

Across the world—here I differ somewhat from the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton)—Governments subsidised shipbuilding rather than ensuring that they had competitive shipowners. The result was massive over capacity, with ships being mothballed and—in some cases—being built and then never going to sea before finally being scrapped. The balance between shipowning and shipbuilding has been unfair and wrong—although, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the amendment would help both to some extent.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very keen on talking about level playing fields. It should be recognised that some playing fields are very difficult to level; that certainly applies to international subsidies, especially shipowning subsidies. The Chamber of Shipping has made it clear that it is behind the Government in seeking to get rid of subsidies across the board; meanwhile, however, something must be done to help those involved. That is the reason for the amendment on which my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) has expounded so eloquently.

The fact is that, when it comes to level playing fields, the Chancellor has already conceded that there are some situations in which it is necessary to have special help, as exemplified by enterprise zones and the 100 per cent. investment allowance which, in essence, is what my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey argues ought to be extended to the shipping industry. So there is no great point of principle here which has not already been conceded by the Treasury.

There is, however, as I know from my own experience, always some danger, as far as the Treasury is concerned, that this will open the floodgates and that further appeals of this sort will be made. The Treasury will ask whether it is possible to ring-fence the particular thing for which hon. Members are putting forward a case. It is clear to me that the shipping industry is more an international market than any other that one can think of and that it is different from petroleum refining or the chemical industry which, we are told, would immediately apply for this kind of grant.

It is particularly appropriate that my hon. Friend should have moved the amendment in the way that he did, because much of the problem with shipping is that one must invest in a very large lump of equipment at one go and this makes it difficult to raise the necessary amount of money in one go. That is why it is so much easier to do so if one has a front-end-loaded investment allowance.

It is not necessary for me to go into the importance of invisible earnings, but despite their importance they too have been declining, particularly with regard to the insurance industry, for example, and to the role of the City generally. Much of the strength of the City, however, has always been based on the fact that we have been a major shipping nation, so this measure will help not only the shipping industry but also the position of London as an international centre.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I have listened to my right hon. Friend's comments with interest and in total agreement. He has covered the strategic aspects of shipping. Can he find time to say a word about the important defence implications? We are an island nation with responsibilities worldwide and we rely on having our own merchant fleet to carry out some of those responsibilities.

Sir Terence Higgins: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This matter has been debated in the House on a number of occasions and it is exemplified particularly by national defence, which is very important, so I agree very much with what he says.

Turning to the question of cost, there seems to be considerable confusion about the figures. The effect of this amendment is entirely to work through cash flow. The cost to the Government will simply be the cost of financing the reduction of the tax revenues in the early years until such time as the tax revenues increase in the later years of the asset's life. There is no grant as such—merely a cash flow problem—and the cost of financing that cash flow in the intervening time. That profile is very desirable in some ways in the first years because we are at present in a deep recession and the need for raising revenue will increase as the recession ends and the economy is eventually in danger of overheating.

Over the kind of time scale that we are talking of in this amendment, that pattern of cash flow could be quite appropriate. Eventually, if the level of investment is maintained, the cash flow reaches equilibrium and one would not see any great variation over time.

The crucial point, therefore, is what the cost is, and this is where I have some trouble. I have discussed the matter with my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and, more briefly, with the Chancellor. The figures that they are bandying around of the cost of the amendment seem to be far in excess of those that the Chamber of Shipping is estimating. We must take the question of costs into account and it is very important that we should sort out this contradiction and, if necessary, return to the matter on Report so that we can go into it in greater depth.

These figures still seem unresolved, but my understanding from the Chamber of Shipping is that the average cost for each year of investment over, say, five years is likely to be £20 million or £30 million. That is not at all unrealistic for the Treasury, given the benefits which are likely to accrue. As I have already said, it is effectively what is the discounted cash flow, the net present value of the interest forgone over the period when the tax will work its way through. It is not, of course, on the whole of the investment, because we already have an investment allowance of 25 per cent., as I understand it. It is the difference between 25 per cent. and 100 per cent.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will either accept the figures that the Chamber of Shipping has put forward, which I believe to be correct, or give a very clear undertaking that he is prepared to reconcile them and discuss the matter in much greater depth with a view to accepting the proposals made once this point has been sorted out. But, of course, I am talking of the gross cost.

The net cost to the Exchequer is likely over time to be much less, because we have here an investment in new ships. The British register is getting very old. It is inefficient in comparison with newer vessels. Consequently, if it changes from old vessels to new, that in itself, with no change in the level of demand worldwide, is likely to increase the profitability of the companies concerned and in turn the revenue that the Treasury derives. Therefore, there is a net increase in the revenue that the Treasury is likely to get over time with regard to this series of assets.

I understand that, if the register goes on declining at the present rate, it will disappear altogether by 2010. But the ships on the British register may disappear even by the time of the next general election, which we hope is a long way off. Therefore, this is something that cannot be deferred indefinitely, even if some time is needed to sort out the precise figures and exactly what needs to be done, because it is abundantly clear that something needs to be done with regard to the British shipping industry.

I believe that the proposals the industry puts forward to limit this arrangement for, say, a five-year period while negotiations on reducing unfair competition worldwide can continue are in essence very moderate. The cost anyway depends only on there actually being investments, except in a very trivial amount; it is only if the companies invest that there is any deferment, even, of taxation.

Surely more investment is fundamentally what we need. Certainly, for the balance of payments it is very important. As the economy recovers, the balance of payments will clearly become an increasing rather than a diminishing problem.

For all those reasons, I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary can give a sympathetic response. I believe that I am right in saying that in the past he has made some speeches not dissimilar from the one that I am now delivering, and therefore it is not unreasonable to hope that we shall receive a sympathetic response from him this evening and that at the very least we shall return to this matter very soon—as soon as we can sort out the figures. I believe that the Chamber's figures are right and that the case for the amendments and assistance for the industry is very strong.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): I shall speak briefly in support of the amendment, which was moved strongly by the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), who told us that the scale of decline of the British shipping industry was such that we were now 33rd in the world. The right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) recalled a time when we were first and foremost in the world. Even as recently as 13 years ago we ranked fourth in the world, so the decline has been very speedy.

Over the same period, the shipping industry's contribution to the balance of payments has halved. The Chamber of Shipping has said that in the past two years over 17 companies have crewed out, flagged out or folded.

I underline the comments about the need for the Government to act urgently now. Whatever the precise date of the ultimate collapse—whether by the next general election, by the year 2000 or even by the year 2010—there is clearly a desperate worry which is closing in on us quickly. We can all agree that thousands of jobs would go, that there would be an implication for the balance of payments and that there would be knock-on effect on the shipbuilding industry and on many other industries. The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) spoke with an obvious constituency interest in the future of shipbuilding. On a very much smaller scale, I have constituents who cross the River Torridge to work at the Appledore shipyard.

The relative decline in the British shipping industry must have something to do with the unequal tax treatment of the shipping industry in various countries. I echo the words of the right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins). The Liberal Democrats would like there to be a concentration on getting other countries to remove the advantages that they are giving. However, we must be realistic. That process will take time. Even within the European Community, decision-making is slow, and we must remember that many of the key players are not members of the European Community.

We must be realistic about the time that the process will take, and we must see the matter in the context of the urgency of our problem. In the meantime, it is essential for the Government to do someting about the problem. If they act too late, the whole industry will be gone. It must be appropriate for the Government to intervene. When other countries have done so, their shipping industries have responded and have improved—America and Japan being two of the most recent examples.

I have no way of knowing whether the Government's estimates of what the proposal would cost are right, or whether the estimates by the Chamber of Shipping are more likely to be right. We must cost the proposals and the benefits that would accrue from them. We have already heard that the shipping industry internationally is expanding.

In the context of the widespread concern in the industry and among the public about the practice of flags of convenience, especially in the wake of the Braer disaster, the shipping industry in Britain must be in a strong position, with its reputation for being modern, efficient and safe. It needs the aid that the amendment offers to take advantage of that opportunity. The fleet could easily double if it was given such assistance. Whatever the cost, there would surely be a long-term gain, even to the Revenue.

As has been said, the Government recognise various areas as needing special help, one example being regional enterprise initiatives. The right hon. Member for Worthing was right to point out that the enormous outlay on the purchase of a ship which must be made in the first year should be addressed through capital allowances at the same time, rather than being forced to be written off over nine years, as is the present arrangement. The Government may wonder whether they can afford to accept the amendment. I simply ask whether they can afford not to. The impact on industry would be immediate and dramatic. In five years, the average age of the fleet could have halved. Earnings would have increased, employment would have expanded and the Government would have benefited through an improved contribution to the balance of payments.

The right hon. Member for Worthing was too modest in his anticipation of what the proposal might mean in terms of tax revenue. If we forecast far enough forward, we can see that it would bring a gain to the Revenue and that it would also make a contribution to our defence capability, as other hon. Members have said. The amendment is well measured and I have pleasure in pledging my colleagues' support for it.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak in support of the amendments. I declare an interest as a solicitor who has practised for many years in maritime matters. In my time as a maritime lawyer, I have witnessed a steady decline in the British merchant fleet and in its position in the world. Other colleagues, notably my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins), have eloquently explained the importance of British shipping to this country. The industry contributes £2·3 billion net a year. It employs about 20,000 seafarers and a further 30,000 ashore.

It is important to have this debate again this year because, as has been explained with great detail and eloquence, it will be unnecessary and academic in a few years' time because the British merchant fleet will no longer exist. If one takes a straight line extrapolation, at its present rate of attrition, the fleet will effectively have disappeared by the year 2010.

The shipping industry is emphatically not a smokestack industry that is simply looking for handouts. We have already heard at some length about the level playing field difficulty, which applies to this industry more than most others, and the extent to which other countries, including some notable shipping nations in the European Community, provide favourable but unfair fiscal regimes for their ship owners and operators. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing said, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is not unsympathetic to the British shipping and shipbuilding industry. If my hon. Friend feels that the amendments do not achieve the purpose for which they are intended, the Chamber of Shipping and other groups representing the British shipping industry will be more than happy to continue discussing other options.

The 40 per cent. first-year allowance is welcomed, but it is not enough. We must do everything that we can to give our shipowners the sort of competitive edge that other countries have given their shipowners. The intent of the amendments has been explained, as one might expect, with great skill by a former Treasury Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing. He said that the benefits could end up as more or less self-financing and the real net cost for each year of investment would range between possibly £20 million and £30 million.

If there is a genuine difference of opinion between Treasury officials and Chamber of Shipping officials about those figures, let them continue the discussion and debate. Naturally, the figures are based on certain assumptions. Essentially, they expect the current level of ordering—about 34 ships—to double. That also takes into account another possible amendment to the Budget relating to roll-over relief, but I will not refer to that amendment in this debate.

There are many arguments why the British merchant fleet needs help. We have heard the important arguments about the balance of payments and the strategic and defence issues. I shall concentrate on only one argument on which I can speak with considerable personal knowledge—the contribution of related activities to shipping, especially in the City of London.

Apart from the contribution made by British shipping in carrying not only our goods but those of other nations across the seas, the other activities to which I refer earn a further £1·5 billion net for the balance of payments. In the City of London, we take care of more than half the world's marine insurance, protection and indemnity coverage, chartering and cargo broking, ship finance and management, arbitration, law and consultancy services, the classification societies and so on.

Recently, we have had debates in the House about the importance of the commercial court in London in terms of attracting litigants from abroad. A substantial part of the business of that court derives from London's reputation as the prime maritime centre in the world. I know from personal experience that other centres, such as New York, Piraeus and so on, cannot come close to challenging the pre-eminence of London in this field.

One of the most dramatic statistics is that the number of British seafarers is shrinking alarmingly—there may be only 5,000 active officers by the year 2000. We need 1,300 new officer cadet entrants a year, yet we took only 343 in 1992. That means that fewer and fewer in due course will come ashore either to pass on their expertise to others or to enter the support and service sectors that I have described.

In other words, inevitably the shrinking of our national fleet will sooner or later have a knock-on effect on other important parts of the economy. How can we remain a leading maritime and financial centre when we are no longer truly a significant maritime nation? To take one example, how can we expect to influence the new international rules drawn up to combat the possibility of another Braer disaster around our shores if we are no longer a major player in the maritime world?

I urge my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to continue a dialogue with the British shipping industry and seize the unprecedented opportunity of two Budgets in one year to put the matter right—if not today, later this year.

9.30 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I support amendments Nos. 37 and 38, to which my name is attached. The amendments are designed to encourage the purchase of new ships by allowing those who order ships to take advantage of 100 per cent. capital allowances. I believe that the amendments can help to stimulate a much-needed renewal and expansion of the British maritime fleet, perhaps to the extent that the present level of ordering of about 34 new ships each year could be doubled.

The right hon. Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) talked about the costs to the Revenue. It is obviously right that we should concentrate on that to some extent. I shall return to the figures that he mentioned later. It might assist the Economic Secretary in assessing the likely cost of the measures to the Revenue if he worked with the figure that I suggested—which the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) also suggested. An assumption that the measure might double the ordering of ships—another 30-odd ships each year—is a reasonable basis on which the Economic Secretary might calculate the cost to the Revenue.

The hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) set out in some detail the arguments for amendments Nos. 37 and 38. I shall endeavour to avoid repeating the statistics that have been set out clearly already. I might try to add one or two of my own.

It is clear that there has been an inexorable decline in both the United Kingdom-registered and United Kingdom-owned fleet. The figure that I find significant is that, in 1975, we had about 9 per cent. of the world total. That figure had declined by 1991 to a mere 1 per cent. Clearly, if that decline continues at that rate, the alarming conclusions which others have reached this evening that the fleet will disappear fairly quickly is inevitable.

The disappearance of the British merchant fleet was well discussed in a report by the Transport Select Committee as long ago as 1987. It set out several arguments for maintaining a United Kingdom-registered fleet, which follow on from the various speeches that have been made this evening.

The Select Committee talked about the impact on trade of a serious reduction in the fleet. It talked about the danger in both defence and economic terms of being entirely dependent on others to move the United Kingdom's imports and exports. That matter was referred to in an intervention. It has not so far been discussed in detail in the debate, but we should have regard to it.

The Select Committee referred also to the contribution made by shipping to the balance of payments. The Chamber of Shipping estimates that British shipping contributes some £4 billion gross to the United Kingdom's foreign earnings and £2·4 billion net. It comments that British shipping underpins the City maritime services, which earn more than £1·2 billion net abroad. That, obviously, was the observation made by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson).

The figures for the balance of payments are a matter of great concern to the Committee at this stage in our deliberations. Clearly, we are looking at the Chancellor's proposals against the background of a serious balance of payments difficulty. If, in the context of these measures, we can improve that situation, even if it is a modest improvement, surely it should be welcomed.

Without repeating the various statistics that have already been given about the decline in the maritime fleet, it might be worth asking why that decline has taken place when other countries seem to have been able to stabilise their fleets and, in some cases, to increase them

All our major European competitors appear to have been able to establish attractive fiscal regimes that have encouraged investment in shipping. That is certainly the case in Denmark, Germany, Greece, Norway and Sweden. There has been a judicious use of tax incentives—not grants but a favourable fiscal environment, by means of which those countries have been able to reverse the decline in size of their fleets.

Not only have they been able to reverse the decline in size of the fleets—the numbers of ships—but, more importantly, with regard to the present problems of the United Kingdom maritime fleet, they have significantly improved the aid profile of their fleets. That is crucial where new technology is increasingly used, particularly to reduce operating costs for shipping.

It has been clearly said that one of the key problems faced by owners in the United Kingdom is that, as they are competing in a world market with higher technology vessels, they are caught in a situation in which their high operating costs and consequentially relatively low revenue means that they are, in effect, forced either to sell or to scrap their existing ships. The idea of the amendments is clearly to allow those fleets to be developed, to purchase new ships, so that we can more effectively compete in what is clearly a vigorous and competitive world market.

I said that I would return to the question of costs, which has already been covered in some detail by the right hon. Member for Worthing. I simply want to endorse the figures that he gave. The Chamber of Shipping has suggested that the scheme might cost about £70 million gross in the first year. Obviously, the cost of the scheme will depend on how successful it is, but if the net costs that the Chamber of Shipping has set out are between £20 million and £30 million a year, it is difficult to see how the Government can resist such a sensible approach for the United Kingdom shipping fleet.

When we are considering those costs, I invite the Economic Secretary to the Treasury and the Government to put on the scales the benefits to the Revenue that are likely to arise from the economic advantages that the country will derive from a renewed and expanded British maritime fleet. Clearly, if we have a more competitive fleet —that is the argument—a fleet that is newer, more effective and based on the use of high technology, it will contribute higher tax revenues to the Exchequer. It would be a consequential benefit to our balance of payments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) talked about the prospect of increased orders for ships and maritime equipment within the United Kingdom, and that clearly would be a consequence of the proposals. In addition, the hon. Member for Eastbourne talked about strengthening the United Kingdom's maritime services, particularly in the City of London. For all those reasons, we should support amendments Nos. 37 and 38 as a significant contribution to Britain's economic well-being.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I am grateful for this opportunity to make a brief contribution to the debate, which could not be described as anything other than thoroughly thoughtful and measured. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will take into account the concern, interest and determination of the Committee for a change in present policies.

When I last spoke on the issue in July, the debate focused on the defence implications of the decline in the British merchant fleet. As part of the justification for these amendments, hon. Members have already made that point. Nevertheless, I want to emphasise it again.

We are coming very close to the time when our defence strategy could be gravely at risk due to our inability to sealift our forces to where they are required in the world, because we do not have British flag vessels for that purpose. This argument has gone on for more than a decade.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) asked for a sympathetic reaction to the amendment from those who sit on the Treasury Bench. I, too, ask for a sympathetic reaction. I have little sympathy for the Government's position because of their inaction on this issue, despite repeated warnings from many hon. Members for many years about the dangers of the inexorable decline of the British merchant fleet.

I shall not re-emphasise how dangerous that decline is, other than to make the point that 10 years ago, on the eve of the Falklands war, the British flag fleet was 10 times larger that it is today. There has therefore been a dramatic drop over a decade. It must not continue. If it is not to continue, we need a change of policy. I am giving away no secrets when I say that the recently retired First Sea Lord has flagged up, as other senior naval officers have done over many years, the dangers, from the defence aspect, of allowing the decline to continue.

On that aspect, and as justification for the amendment, which we support, my view is that this is a classic case of pass the parcel between different Departments of State. The Ministry of Defence is concerned about the sealift issue. That was confirmed last summer by the Minister of State for Defence Procurement. The Department of Transport is the sponsor Department for the industry, and the key to any resolution of the issue is the Treasury. It is Treasury Ministers whom I have firmly in my sights tonight. They hold the key to the resolution of this problem. They are friendly sights, but they are quite beady.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that part of our policy for recovery is to give a higher profile to manufacturing industry. That is the Prime Minister's commitment, but action has to follow words. Many other hon. Members suggested that this amendment would also have a beneficial effect on the shipbuilding industry, but in a thoroughly sensible way. It would not, as happened in the past, result in over-capacity. That point was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins).

I emphasise, too, the key importance of what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) about the effect on invisibles that the rundown of the merchant fleet will have. As he said—I could not make this point more strongly in support of his argument—we cannot expect to maintain a viable City-linked, City-based shipping service if we do not have a shipping industry: the two go together. Many people who are involved in shipping in the City are effective in their jobs because they have seagoing experience, and we cannot have one without the other.

I want to be brief, and I do not want to labour points that have already been made. I emphasise to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that I am looking for a commitment from him on a minimum of three things: first, that the Treasury is at last seized of the need to arrest the decline in the British merchant fleet; secondly, that he will give further consideration to the arguments that have been deployed tonight, and that we shall return to the issue on report; thirdly, that he and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will meet representatives of the industry to discuss these issues between now and Report. That is what I look for; it is the minimum that can give me satisfaction as I speak in support of the amendment so clearly moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey.

9.45 pm

Mr. David Shaw: I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on, I believe, his maiden shipping debate speech. Hon. Members who advocate the cause of British shipping welcome his joining our debates and the expertise and experience of the shipping industry that he will bring to bear on the issue.

I have, as many hon. Members will know, a strong constituency interest, and over the years my name has been attached to a number of amendments similar to this one. Indeed, I have had the honour of moving amendments to previous Finance Bills, and I advanced the case in an Adjournment debate last year.

The United Kingdom shipping industry is of much importance to this country; we cannot let it deline. Its recent decline accelerated under the previous Labour Government. We all recall Labour's subsidies for Polish ships and its support for the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development code, which resulted in the British shipping industry not getting its fair share of the market. We also recall the Labour Government of 1974-79 trading with socialist countries that subsidised their shipbuilders. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) spoke of the socialist countries that had subsidised their shipping and shipbuilding industries.

The Government and the Conservative party saved the United Kingdom's car industry. We transformed the car industry, which was in terminal decline under Labour. Why cannot we now tackle the shipping industry? We rescued and rebuilt the car industry, and the time has come to rebuild British shipping.

Many jobs are at stake—not only the direct jobs on the ships and, in my constituency, on the ferries, but jobs in ports, in legal services, in ship brokers, in insurance, the lawyers, accountants and all the many other jobs that are directly and indirectly dependent on the industry. The Government could use this issue to show that they intend to tackle unemployment in London and the south-east. Unemployment in London is high compared with the rest of the country, and many of the jobs involved in the shipping industry are based in London and the south-east.

The amendment may call for 100 per cent. allowances, and the Government may be nervous that 100 per cent. would be excessive, but the answer is that surely we should go for some improvement on the present 25 per cent. writing-down allowance. The purpose of the amendment is to draw attention to the plight of the industry. Hon.

[Mr. David Shaw]

Members have already mentioned the age of the fleet, and that problem is getting worse. If nothing is done, there will be a significant reduction in the size of the fleet.

The Government have always had to recognise that there is a problem with the balance of payments if we have fixed exchange rates. We may now have floating exchange rates, but we still have a significant import bill, and shipping could play a major part in reducing the effect of those imports on our balance of payments. The importance of defence, and the fact that we still need a good merchant marine for defence purposes, have also been mentioned.

Why must we change capital allowances above all else? I have answered that question before and I shall answer it again. The Treasury must read the report of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York following the 1988 changes to capital allowances, which makes it clear that the United Kingdom is most competitive in many areas—that is why we get foreign investment here—but that capital allowances are the one factor on which we are not competitive.

The shift in capital allowances went too far in the wrong direction, and it is now necessary to reverse it. In his autumn statement, the Chancellor did reverse it, but for one year only. The shipping industry needs that change to be made permanent.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir. T. Higgins) said earlier, a ship represents enormous capital expenditure which, compared with expenditure in other industries, is out of all proportion in terms of the revenue earned. A ship is a very expensive item. The new ferries that P and O has introduced in my constituency cost nearly £100 million apiece. If we are to invest in such shipping and to create the jobs that result, we must recognise that the capital costs and the capital risks, that a businessman is asked to take are enormous.

We must recognise that the cash expenditure and the tax allowances are out of synchronisation. The cash expenditure is incurred on day one, whereas the tax allowances can take ten or twenty years to come into play. Even after four or five years there are significant tax allowances that are still not available. We must bring about a much fairer position——

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Is my hon. Friend asking us to subsidise the shipping industry?

Mr. Shaw: We are not asking for subsidies. What I ask for is not a subsidy; it would simply bring the risk/reward ratio into line with what it should be. I shall show my hon. Friend the graph and the statistics, and the report of the Federal Reserve Board of New York, and he will see that there would be no subsidy. Risk and reward would simply be brought back into better balance.

Mr. Wells: Let my hon. Friend admit to the Committee that he is asking for competitive subsidy for the shipping industry. That is what he is arguing for; let him be honest about it. That is not the right way in which to conduct a shipping industry in this world. Surely he must admit that?

Mr. Shaw: I reject that suggestion. If I insisted that a 100 per cent. allowance was the only solution, perhaps such a measure might reach a point at which it amounted to a subsidy, but I do not believe that that is the only solution. I ask only that it be recognised that the shipping industry has to invest more money in capital risk, recovery of which probably takes a longer time than recovery in any other industry, and that the ratio of labour costs to capital costs is vastly different.

Because there is a different risk/reward ratio, it must be accepted that there should be different tax treatment. One hundred per cent. of labour costs are written off in the year in which they are incurred; it is only capital costs in the industry that are written off over a long period.

As has already been said, when we compare the United Kingdom with the rest of Europe, we realise that there is not a level playing field in the shipping industry. I accept that we are in danger of having to go down the subsidy route because other nations are subsidising their industries out of all proportion to what is required. That is why I say that it may be necessary to have a 100 per cent. allowance for a short term so that we may have a level playing field where we can compete with the rest of Europe.

I should prefer an allowance structure that reflects the risk/reward ratio. I do not believe that, in the long term, it will be necessary to go to 100 per cent. However, we need more than the 25 per cent. writing down allowance, which does not reflect the risk/reward ratio. The report of the Federal Reserve Board makes it clear that it does not work.

I know that the Government are listening to this case as, within the past month, I took representatives of the Chamber of Shipping to see the Secretary of State for Employment. My right hon. Friend was immensely sympathetic. She listened to the problems and is making sure that her civil servants work with the shipping industry to see if a solution is possible.

I have asked for a meeting with the Chancellor. I hope that the Economic Secretary is aware of my request, that he can confirm that the meeting is to take place in the near future, and that he will attend. Such a meeting is necessary. We must put across the case for the shipping industry, and action must be taken. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm that he is on line to take in the information that we want to bring to him. I look forward to his comments, and I commend the amendment to the Committee.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: We have had an excellent and very well informed debate on the British shipping industry and on the two amendments that Conservative Members have tabled. The case had been made in very similar terms by the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the parliamentary Labour party. Assistance for the British shipping industry would help our balance of payments. It would improve our invisible earnings and increase tax revenues. Hon. Members have stressed the unique trading position of British shipping as an industrial sector. It trades internationally and operates in a very competitive and highly vulnerable market.

We have heard about the steady decline of the British fleet. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) drew attention to the report of the Select Committee on Transport, which says that the decline in the British fleet is damaging trade. Hon. Members taking part in this debate have pointed out the importance to the Ministry of Defence of ships taken up from trade. Such ships were, of course, available at the time of the Falklands conflict, but if they were needed today they would not be available.

The scale of the problem facing the country today is shown by the fact that, of the approximately 19,000 people serving in the merchant marine, about 8,500 are officers. It takes four to 10 years to train a Merchant Navy officer. The average of officers is rising. This is a feature not of stagnation in the industry but of quite dramatic decline. It has important implications for the long-term future of the industry and for the future defence of the country.

The hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) knows something about these issues. As a Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry, he dealt with them. He has said that the decline could be terminal by the year 2000. In the Select Committee, estimates have varied, but only by 10 years either way. There is not much of the industry left. The case for doing something now to help it is overwhelming.

I represent a community that has long-standing connections with the shipping and shipbuilding industries. Indeed, South Shields and North Shields have provided both ships and seamen for centuries. Sadly, their association with those industries has paralleled the industries themselves in their decline. Every hon. Member representing a shipbuilding community will remember how, at the time of the Falklands war, their constituents worked all the hours they possibly could to defend the interests of their country. That was in 1982. Some of those shipyard workers even went to sea with the fleet and served in this conflict. What happened to them? When they returned to this country, most of them were made redundant. A similar fate has befallen merchant seamen. There has been a steady decline.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) pointed out, the quality of engineering work, and the computerisation and high technology aspects of the shipbuilding industry are often misunderstood. Nevertheless, they are important.

Enormous efforts have been made in the shipbuilding industrial sector, yet yesterday the Government effectively closed Swan Hunter on Tyneside. There are no orders, no work and no future for it. There was a management buy-out in 1986. Probably it is impossible for management buy-outs to compete with companies like GEC and VSEL in the industrial sector. Certainly it is impossible for them to compete with the Government in the form of Harland and Wolff.

I remind the House of the bewilderment, the bitterness and the anger felt on Tyneside because of what has happened to its shipbuilding industry. It is also right to assert that the Government should do something now to help, not our shipbuilding industry because that has gone, but the shipping and shipbuilding industry which could be helped by the amendments. The Government should accept the amendments, or there should be a vote.

In the past, we have been sceptical about 100 per cent. capital allowances, because we have been worried about the artificial manipulaton of losses and the offsetting of losses against other obligations to the Exchequer. Those issues are dealt with elsewhere in the Bill, so we need not have quite the same fear.

Conservative Members have hinted at discussions with the Treasury team. Some want discussions before returning to the matter on Report; others want discussions before returning to it perhaps in November. Discussions are likely to be protracted, in view of the attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to such amendments.

If we want to concentrate the Government's mind on the amendments, the way to do so is to insert them into the Bill as an aide memoire. If the Government have better suggestions, they can put them before the House on Report. We could then consider their suggestions on their merits and compare them with the amendments, which I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to support.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): May I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) on the able way in which he moved the amendment and on the compelling and thoughtful debate that has ensued? There is no doubt about the strength of feeling on both sides of the Committee about the importance of the British merchant fleet, and of sustaining it for the future and recognising the serious difficulties and problems through which it has sailed in recent years. Tonight I am charged with the difficult responsibility—[Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The Chair is having great difficulty in hearing the Minister. If we could have a little quiet, it would be helpful.

Mr. Nelson: I am charged with the difficult responsibility of recognising and sympathising with those real concerns, but also of setting out clearly to the Committee the primacy of dealing with the state of public finances which underlies the Budget strategy. I shall return to that in a moment. I shall also deal briefly with the contributions of all hon. Members, but I wish first to put on record a few statements about this important issue which has become something of a hardy annual in Finance Bill debates.

The amendment would introduce one leg of the industry's proposals, namely, 100 per cent. first year allowances for money spent on ships. We previously made it clear that we recognised the important contribution which shipping makes to the economy and the central role which industry can be called upon to play—[Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have just appealed for Members to give the Chair and the Committee an opportunity to listen to what the Minister is saying. If Members beyond the Bar want to have discussions, will they please leave the Chamber?

Mr. Nelson: The Government have, over successive years, done things to help the British Merchant Navy. They are doing things in this Budget and they have an open mind for the future, as and when the opportunity arises, to continue to sustain and help the industry. Let me set out the facts.

Since 1979 we have introduced a number of measures, including some on the tax front, to help the industry. First, in 1985 we brought forward the point at which allowances for machinery and plant could be claimed by businesses. Since then, shipping companies have consequently been able to claim relief for new ships from the date when the money was spent rather than from the time when the vessel is brought into use. This is particularly valuable to ships which take time to build.

Secondly, we have specifically helped shipping companies by giving greater flexibility in the use of writing down allowances. Before 1985, allowances for new ships could be postponed and taken in later years whenever it suited the shipowner to do so. In 1985, following representations from the shipping industry, we extended this important concession to cover purchases of second-hand ships. No other industry receives such concessions.

Thirdly, we have twice loosened the requirements which seafarers must meet to be able to claim exemption from United Kingdom tax. They need now spend only six months abroad to qualify for this concession—an arrangement which is more generous than that enjoyed by any other United Kingdom citizen working overseas.

Fourthly, on corporation tax, we have greatly reduced the rates of tax on company profits, from 52 per cent. in 1984 to 33 per cent. We have also introduced very generous arrangements enabling the carrying back of profits to be set against losses over the previous three years.

As for non-tax measures, we have put in place a succession of changes aimed at helping shipping businesses to compete internationally: grants towards the cost of merchant officer training; the funding of the Merchant Navy reserve; and financial assistance with the cost of transporting British crews to and from distant waters. As the Committee will know, next week a very important Bill —the Merchant Shipping (Registration) Bill—will come before the House of Lords which will substantially complete the implementation of the measures agreed by the 1990 joint Government-industry working party.

That list demonstrates the help that we have given to all businesses, and the additional further assistance that we have given to shipping. What we have not been prepared to do is to give concessions at an unjustified level. This amendment, clearly in our view, is just such a measure. There are a number of reasons which I must enunciate for saying that. The arguments so ably presented by my hon. friends deserve the response of the Government, and I will seek to put the Government's arguments.

First, the Government argue that the amendment would be very expensive, costing, on the Chamber of Shipping's own figures, between £80 million and more than £100 million each year in terms of tax revenue forgone—and this of course would fall in the years when finances were at their tightest and taxes generally were having to be raised.

Secondly, the extent to which it would achieve the industry's objective of stimulating increased levels of investment is highly questionable. It is worth remembering that when 100 per cent. first year capital allowances were previously available for investment in shipping, between 1970 and 1984, they did nothing to prevent a significant decline in the size of the United Kingdom merchant fleet —from 32·2 million gross registered tonnes in 1975 to 13·3 million in 1985.

Since our changes to the business tax regime in 1984, we have seen an increase in investment in ships by United Kingdom-owned companies. It is very important to appreciate that. We hear a great deal about the rundown of the British merchant fleet, but on the money side the fact is that in 1988 investment in the shipping fleet was some £45 million, but it rose to £402 million in 1991. This suggests that the remedy for the industry's difficulties must lie outside the fundamental changes to the tax treatment which the industry is seeking.

Thirdly, the amendment would do nothing to stop flagging out. That is because tax allowances are tied to ownership and not to registration, so there would be nothing to stop United Kingdom companies taking the subsidy and continuing to operate the ships from offshore registers. Moreover, such a measure would clearly run counter to the thrust of general tax policy.

Tax breaks for shipping alone would distort the market and resources would be diverted from inherently more profitable investment, which, taking the economy as a whole, might not be a sensible use of the limited financial resources available.

Other countries may choose to subsidise their shipping industries, although it has to be said that none of those countries does so to the extent of giving 100 per cent. first year allowances for capital investment. Our priorities are to ensure that the tax system is fair, that it provides a favourable climate for all businesses to operate in, and that profitable investment is properly rewarded.

Even under the current system, the United Kingdom has a particularly generous system of capital allowances. When the first year allowance for machinery and plant reverts to 25 per cent. in November, expenditure can be written off for tax purposes over seven to eight years, and will still be significantly higher than the rate of economic depreciation for most business assets, particularly for ships, which generally last for much longer than the tax system allows.

The industry, therefore, is already getting a particularly good deal from the present system, and the tax it pays on its profits is the lowest in Europe; it is also lower than that in Japan and the United States.

I turn briefly but specifically to the contributions of my hon. Friends. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey said that time is of the essence. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend) stressed the defence implications and the importance of the shipbuilding industry, a point emotionally and justifiably made by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on behalf of his constituency and the official Opposition.

The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) called for a strategic overview. I acknowledge the importance of the industry in his constituency, which I know well, and point out the help that is available through the home shipbuilding credit guarantee scheme and the shipbuilding intervention fund to assist the industry.

The hon. Gentleman and the House should acknowledge that there are three related but quite separate issues: the shipbuilding industry, the shipowning industry, and the British register of shipping.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): On a point of order, Mr. Lofthouse. It is utterly impossible to hear a word that is being said.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I have appealed to the Committee twice to give the Minister the opportunity to be heard. My appeal appears to have fallen on deaf ears. Once again I appeal to all hon. Members, especially beyond the Bar. If they want to talk, they should leave the Chamber. Those on both Front Benches are not setting a great example.

Mr. Nelson: I am anxious to address with expedition but with courtesy the points raised by those who contributed to this important debate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) rightly referred to the high initial capital cost of ships. We have a generous system of writing down tax allowances, especially with the 40 per cent. enhanced tax allowance introduced in the clause. It will enable people to claim back more than 60 per cent. over two years and, in any case, the writing down allowance of some 25 per cent. is much faster than the rate of depreciation of the real value of the ships.

With regard to the difficulties that my right hon. Friend and others flagged up about differences between the computations of the Chamber of Shipping and the Government, our assessments of the yields forgone and the cost of the measures are based on the figures presented by the Chamber of Shipping which suggested to us that the net cost per annum would be about £30 million to £45 million a year over five years. That is on a net basis, taking account of the guesstimate assessment of income that would accrue from the investments that were made discounted back to a present value basis. If that is not done, the yield cost rises to between £80 and £115 million a year. I believe that the Chamber of Shipping would agree those figures.

The measure adds up to a significant cost, about £380 million over and above the £700 million relief which the Government are providing.

I am the Treasury Minister whose prime responsibility is to sell gilt-edged securities and raise funding through the Department of National Savings. Given the size of this year's PSBR, I have a big enough job on my hands without adding to it significantly. We are providing some £700 million of relief; an additional cost of some £380 million over the next five years would be difficult to sustain.

The hon. Member for North Devon (Mr. Harvey) said that we must act. Like others, he spoke of foreign competition and the balance of payments. I acknowledge that the balance of payments, and the gross inflows of money that have been so important to us in the past, provide the basis of one of the most persuasive arguments in favour of the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) spoke of the shipping industry's importance to the economy, reminding us that some 30,000 people were indirectly employed in it. He and others pointed to its association with professional industries in the United Kingdom; but they, too, rely not only on indirect capital allowances to the British merchant fleet, but on the health and vibrancy of the British economy—on low tax rates and sensible management. They rely on Government to provide a climate in which they can prosper and attract professional business from all over the world.

The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) also spoke of international competition. He asked why the British fleet had declined. I can provide no better reference than the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Dover, who cited some of the reasons for that decline.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) said that the country's defence strategy would be gravely at risk unless we acted now by providing enhanced capital allowances to help the industry. As was pointed out during a debate in July in which my hon. Friend took part, Operation Granby in the Gulf was extremely successful: we were able voluntarily to charter some 109 foreign vessels, and only five United Kingdom vessels. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement has made it clear on behalf of the Government that we can mount such operations, that we have been successful, and that we believe that, if necessary, we could do so again.

My hon. Friend said that, nevertheless, the industry had declined over 10 years, and that that must not be allowed to continue; and he asked me for a commitment that I would listen. I hope I have shown that I have done that. He also asked me for a commitment that I would be prepared to speak to the Chamber of Shipping about the matter in the immediate future. I am more than happy to extend such an invitation, and to meet the Chamber of Shipping.

It is not for me to determine what issues come up on Report, but I am more than willing to concede that it is my responsibility to listen, learn and pay attention to consultations, as I have done during the debate.

For all those reasons and more, I urge all my hon. Friends to understand that we must concentrate on tackling the state of our public finances to ensure that the deficit is tackled without hindrance to recovery. We cannot do that if, in clause after clause, we add to the amount that we must borrow: that is to put off until tomorrow problems with which we must deal today. Although we may not be able to go as far as some would like in helping the industry today, we have a creditable record.

Sir Giles Shaw: I have listened carefully to the speech of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. He has agreed to meet the industry. Will he agree to examine the question of the maritime enterprise zone and other measures to see whether they are acceptable? Provided that he discusses a wide range of issues with the industry, the meeting will be helpful. That is what the industry wants.

Mr. Nelson: I shall be more than happy to entertain any suggestions and ideas that are presented. The Treasury's doors are open. I must point out, however, that, according to our estimates, the three elements of the maritime enterprise zone package would cost between £300 million and £500 million, of which the 100 per cent. allowance would be by far the largest part. It would be quite improper to raise hopes. I must be straight with the Committee, but I will listen to sensible proposals. There may be other times and possibilities. Certainly I give the undertaking that my hon. Friend seeks.

Sir Giles Shaw: I am glad that my hon. Friend recognises that this issue is of extreme importance and one that requires extreme care, good listening and good discussion. In view of the urgency of the matter, I hope that he will agree to do that quickly. If it is possible to make a further statement on Report, or to bring further proposals before the Committee, I hope that he will so do.

In view of these assurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.—[Interruption.]

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move amendment No. 53, in page 84, line 20, leave out "1993" and insert "1994".

It was our original intention to construct this debate in such a way as to allow us to have a general debate on general allowances and perhaps accommodate the debate on shipping as well. However, there was so much interest in the shipping allowances—the Chancellor has taken a deep, long and sustained interest in this matter—that we thought it right to have the debate in the manner which we have done. Many Labour Members wish to debate the matter covered by this amendment—that is, a general debate about capital allowances. Equally, Conservative Members are eager to take part in this debate, and I am sure that there will be an equivalent number of Labour Members. It is good that the Chancellor is here to listen to a debate on what is left of our nation's manufacturing base.

The parameters for the debate are well known to every Member of Parliament who represents a constituency with large manufacturing interests. Indeed, I represented such a constituency until yesterday, although I am not sure that that will be the case next week. The decline in economic growth for 10 consecutive quarters has taken its toll. Throughout that period, we have managed to have a balance of payments deficit. We have had a balance of payments deficit even in recession. The deficit now acts as a constraint on recovery. In 10 of the past 13 years since 1979, net investment in new machinery has taken place at less than the rate at which old machinery has been scrapped. Until 1982, the United Kingdom enjoyed trade surpluses in manufactured goods. Since 1983, we have suffered deficits in the same area. Since 1979, two out of every five jobs in manufacturing industry have disappeared, and the Government's response has been feeble in the extreme.

It is the Labour party's contention that some certainty of intervention is required from the Government. Our amendment, as well as being a vehicle for debate, is modest. It simply seeks to extend the time period for the concessions contained in the Bill. That is not a concept that the Chancellor will find difficult—indeed, he has applied the same concept to many other areas of taxation in the Budget.

The amendment is modest, but it will provide some certainty for those who would like to rely on the concessions. I commend it to the Committee.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): The short-term encouragement of investment in plant and equipment which was provided by the Chancellor's announcement on capital allowances last year was welcome. There are good grounds for believing that it has contributed to the recovery which has clearly begun in manufacturing industry. However, we need a longer-term programme to encourage investment in the United Kingdom, especially investment by small and medium-sized enterprises which are rightly described as crucial to our economic success.

I shall make a brief declaration of interest. My constituency has not only a great deal of manufacturing industry but a number of machine tool companies and I am an adviser to the Machine Tool Technologies Association. It goes without saying that the machine tool industry would like to see a major improvement in capital investment in the United Kingdom. However, it does not seek specific support directed at its own sector. Rather, it looks to the Government to develop fiscal policies which encourage more smaller companies to invest in the type of equipment which will provide tomorrow's growth.

It is often pointed out that a significant proportion of the largest companies in Europe are located in the United Kingdom. A major proportion of the work force here is employed by those companies. But at the same time relatively few small and medium-sized enterprises develop to become manufacturing giants in their own right. It seems likely that one factor which holds them back is a marked reluctance to invest in high technology modern equipment compared with many of their overseas competitors.

I suggest that that is regrettable, not only because of the opportunity forgone to generate additional employment opportunities, but because smaller companies are particularly important in driving forward innovation. The most modern advanced equipment is often expensive. I believe that we need a strategic policy to help small and medium-sized companies to re-equip and put themselves at the leading edge of technology. That is what the Japanese and others who have enjoyed considerable success have done in the past. It is not called intervention, but it is a policy which encourages investment. It is directed specifically towards smaller firms, which happen to be those which are often placed at a disadvantage because they are more vulnerable than many of their customers and suppliers in matters such as cash flow and because they are reluctant to take risks which might leave them at the mercy of their bankers.

Although Japan, like other countries, has suffered in the recession, it is notable that in recent years Japanese companies have invested twice as much as many others in capital equipment. If we are to get on the same track, we need to follow suit. The Confederation of British Industry national manufacturing council has said that Britain needs to double its level of investment in capital equipment by the end of the decade in order to match our industrial competitors.

In terms of investment, the United Kingdom has remained bottom of the G7 countries and low down among the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries. In Europe, German economic performance has been particularly notable in recent years. The National Institute of Economic and Social Research has identified low levels of investment in capital as a major deficiency among British firms compared with their German counterparts.

A choice between more generous capital allowances and higher corporation tax is often put. My experience is that, offered that choice, a substantial proportion of companies would be willing to pay a higher rate of corporation tax, provided that it was combined with more positive allowances to encourage investment.

The debate has provided an opportunity to air the issue. I suggest that we need a more focused incentive to investment than the amendment implies. Capital allowances should be more generous than those which currently exist, but they should bring special benefits to smaller and medium-sized enterprises. Above all, they should be targeted to bring about the investment in the type of high technology which is more widely available to some of Britain's most successful competitors and which is becoming increasingly essential. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will therefore consider the need for an appropriate strategy.

Mr. Beith: There are broadly two views about corporation tax allowances and the rate of corporation tax and the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) has just advanced one of them. The Chancellor has embraced both of them during the past two years. One view is that we should try to keep the corporation tax rate down and, therefore, not grant a wide range of capital allowances. The other is that capital allowances for investment are more likely to bring about investment and that many business men—I know that this is true—would be willing to accept such a trade-off. They would risk a higher rate of corporation tax, or at least no further reduction, if they could get higher investment allowances.

Those who favour allowances include those who believe that those allowances should be selective or targeted. The hon. Member for Keighley advanced that view. The Labour party has advanced that view from time to time by seeking a restriction to manufacturing industry. It is one thing to target certain things which seem to be for the general good and should be the subject of allowances, such as environmental improvements; it is another to draw a broad distinction between manufacturing industry and services. That cannot reasonably be done. It does not make sense. I say that despite wishing to see British manufacturing industry revived. To impose an artificial division between manufacturing and services would not help British industry.

In the aftermath of the recession the Government were forced to look for a way to stimulate the economy, and so departed from their previous strong line against more generous capital allowances. In doing so, they probably reflected the views of many business men. Certainly in the consultations that I have had recently with business men, the majority have argued for the allowance route rather than the lower corporation tax route.

If one tells business men to bear in mind the fact that Britain has lower corporation tax than Germany, they say, "Yes, but look at the use that German manufacturers are able to make of their investment allowances, the level of investment and the quality of German manufacturing plant compared with ours". That is a persuasive argument. It leads one to consider the merits of the amendment, which argues for extending the time scale.

Perhaps we can have a sort of Newbury extension to the capital allowances in the light of the fact that there is clearly greater public dissatisfaction over the recession than the Government first allowed. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said that the Chancellor had readily taken up the concept of extending the time scale into other aspects of tax policy. He carries it also into his view of his job. He is extending the time scale of that as much as he possibly can against all those who are trying to get rid of him.

There probably would be merit in extending the time scale. The Government may have in mind the fact that a cut-off date is sometimes in itself a useful way of stimulating investment, as Lord Howe found out when he was Chancellor. But industry is looking for longer-term encouragement.

Despite my belief that we do not want to get to the point where the Government are choosing what is industry's best investment, trying to run industry and having such a complex system of investment allowances that they are pretending to know better than industry what is a sensible investment, we must listen, particularly in the face of all the signs of the decline of our manufacturing industry, to the pleas of manufacturers for investment allowances.

There was a case for the Government's decision in the Budget to go back on their previous rather hard line on the issue and there may be a case for keeping it going a bit longer.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): When I spoke recently with local business men and with Coventry and Warwickshire CBI at its annual meeting with local Members of Parliament, two issues emerged that were central to their decision to invest in manufacturing. The first was the need for better incentives, particularly capital allowances, over the longer term to encourage manufacturing investment. The second was the need to have confidence in the Chancellor's management of the economy so that they could have confidence that the Government knew what they were doing and had some sort of long-term strategy which would allow them to invest in their industry. The Budget and the Bill provide neither of those.

My constituency and my region have been hard hit by the recession. In north Warwickshire, unemployment has risen by 135 per cent. since the Prime Minister took office. Federal Express, Burlingtons and Coventry pit have all closed. Daw Mill pit has sought to make redundant 587 men, half its work force. In the west midlands as a whole, manufacturing industry has been devastated. In the past couple of months 640 jobs were lost at Rolls-Royce in Coventry, 100 jobs at British Rail in Walsall, 75 at Courtaulds in Coventry, 227 at Leyland DAF and 160 at Sandwell Contract Services. The list goes on.

Once, local people in the west midlands were proud to see "Made in the west midlands" on products. Unfortunately, that is now all too rare. Britain's manufacturing heartland now has 42 people chasing every job. Indeed, "Made in Britain" is not only on fewer products these days, but more products are imported into Britain having been made in Hong Kong, the United States, France or Taiwan, than we export with "Made in Britain" on them.

Manufacturing investment fell by 13 per cent. between 1989 and 1991. In 1992 it fell by 2 per cent. and it is expected to grow only marginally this year. The decline in manufacturing industry, resulting from the lack of a clear industrial strategy, is the major cause of our balance of trade problems.

Manufacturing activity is now barely above the levels of 1979, while our performance relative to most of our competitors has seen Britain slipping further behind. Many business men see the Conservative attitude to manufacturing investment as that expressed by a recent Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said:

> "I am at a loss to understand the selective importance attached . . . to the manufacturing sector."—[Official Report, 9 February 1984; Vol. 53, c. 1009.]

The present Chancellor's recent conversion to the need to give some support to manufacturing industry is an example of too little, too late. The damage has been done. Determined action is needed for recovery and the Bill does not provide that action.

Manufacturing is a key sector of the economy, because it is the engine of growth and the purveyor of technical progress. As a nation, two thirds of our earnings from foreign currency come from manufactured goods. With the decline in North sea oil, the manufacturing sector is the essential ingredient for solving the balance of payments problem. Failure to support manufacturing investment in the 1980s has resulted in a trade deficit in the middle of a recession for the first time in post-war history. Import penetration is growing. As recovery comes, imports are likely to increase, making the deficit even worse.

If we are to avoid a balance of payments crisis and a collapse of the pound, we must begin to act. Labour's call to extend capital allowances is an important element in an overall package. It recognises the need to boost manufacturing as recovery takes place. Business men know that the Government's deferred tax increases, planned for next year, will hit demand at the very time that they expected to invest more in order to create recovery. They will be concerned about too great a commitment of their companies' finances and resources at the very time when the recovery, such as it is, may be damaged by the Government's deferred tax increases.

It seems that this is the first recovery in history where action has been taken to damp it down before it has really got started. Business men need greater encouragement over the longer term to invest, both now and over the next few years, to ensure that British manufacturing industry can recover and create the goods to meet any new demand that may be created in Britain, rather than allowing that demand to suck in imports. That is why capital allowances are so important.

Capital allowances, however, must be seen as only part of an overall strategy for manufacturing industry. That strategy must include improving the skills of our current work force and improving the education of our young people, our future work force. We must create a highly educated, highly skilled new work force that is able to adapt to the changing demands of business and the international economy.

One set of figures is interesting in this connection—that 27 per cent. of British workers have technical qualifications, whereas 53 per cent. in Germany, 57 per cent. in the Netherlands and 40 per cent. in France have technical qualifications. If we do not increase our skills, we shall be unable to compete on quality. If we cannot compete on the quality of our products, we shall be forced to drive down wages and overheads so as to be able to compete on price. We do not want to see British salaries and working conditions decline to third-world levels. Until Ministers remove the low-skill shackles from workers, Britain will not have a long-term competitive future.

Other key needs include improved infrastructure, particularly the transport infrastructure. We also need to target high technology and high-growth new businesses, with tax allowances for new investment. We need, too, financial institutions that look to the long term, that invest in the long term and that small business men can rely upon to see them through the troughs of recession. It is the lack of a clear industrial strategy to complement capital allowances that is missing in Government policy.

At the moment, business men cannot see any strategy in place. That brings us back to the central issue that business men in my area have relayed to me—a lack of confidence. Business men need a Government who have direction and leadership. The current Chancellor does not inspire confidence in his judgment. He was the Chancellor who hallucinated about the green shoots that were not there and who promised no devaluation, no leaving the exchange rate mechanism, no VAT rises and no tax rises. How can the country have confidence in the economic judgment of a Chancellor who changes his policies so readily, so quickly and so easily? The Chancellor explained away his U-turns—his S-bends—by saying during the last election campaign that he had no plans to raise taxes: he did not foresee the problems or the length of the recession.

Even if that were entirely true, does not the Chancellor see that that undermines the confidence of business men in his judgment about how the country and the economy should develop? We have a Chancellor whose judgment is unsound and a Prime Minister who took us into the ERM at too high an exchange rate. That suggests that both men at the helm of Britain's economy are quite capable of taking us on to the rocks. Business men know that the judgment of the Chancellor is unsound and that the Budget will do nothing to restore confidence.

Business men know that, if there is any recovery, it will be, in a sense, by accident rather than as a result of the success of Government policy. Britain is now in a more competitive position because of its withdrawal from the ERM, and that withdrawal was a failure of Government policy. Therefore, any possible recovery will be the result not of success of a policy that was pursued over a long period but of the Government's failure to follow their stated policy. In pursuing that policy, which was initiated by the current Prime Minister, more than 10 per cent. of the work force lost their jobs.

Britain needs a long-term policy aimed at full employment, supply side policies directed at skills, infrastructure and investment in plant and machinery. That is needed particularly to boost our manufacturing exports to tackle the balance of payments deficit. Without such policies, the United Kingdom economy cannot increase its productive capacity, competitiveness or growth and unemployed people in my constituency will not find the jobs that they so very much need.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I do not intend to detain the House very long, but I want to deal with the appalling results of the Government's lack of an industrial strategy in the past 14 years.

The Government's strategy has been based on one simple numerical indicator—getting down inflation. As a result of their rather bungled attempts to reduce inflation we have lost a huge part of our manufacturing industry.

Manufacturing's share has fallen by 6 or 7 per cent. of GDP since 1979. I am sure that, in time-honoured fashion, the Minister will say that it has fallen in other countries and that it is due to the world recession, increased productivity and so on, but it has fallen by only 3 per cent. in Germany and by only 2 per cent. in France. Those figures are not comparable with Britain's huge deficit.

The Government should have looked carefully at the industrial strategy that the Labour party proposed before the last election. By the end of this Parliament, they will have come round to our view, and probably will adopt many of our ideas.

We said that more investment should be made in capital equipment, in training and education and especially in industrial research and development. Such investment is sadly lacking in this country. A comparison of capital spending per employee in other countries shows clearly what that lack of investment is doing. If we take the United Kingdom's base line as one, the United States and Germany spend about one and a half times as much. France spends 1·6 times as much per employee on capital equipment, and Japan 2·7 times as much. That is why they have better equipped factories, better motivated workers and better management.

It is important to explain that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) said, everything is linked, and the lack of training sometimes deters managers from introducing new machinery. It is true that the poor level of training of the average British worker means that in British factories it takes longer to train workers when new equipment is installed than it does in Germany or France. That is due not to an inherent lack of skill in British workers but to a lack of training, and it often makes it difficult for managers to install new machinery.

Incentives are therefore needed. It is right that the time limits should be extended, and I hope that Ministers will consider that idea carefully. We now have an enormous trade deficit in some extremely important goods, such as electrical goods, motor vehicles, textiles, footwear and clothing—all of which are categories in which Britain used to reign supreme, certainly in Europe and probably in the world.

It may seem curious that I, as the hon. Member of Parliament for Cambridge, should speak about manufacturing industry, although most of the companies in my constituency are small high-tech firms. However, several firms in my constituency supply machinery to larger manufacturing industries, and that is the cause of my concern. If the Government provided some incentive for firms to equip themselves better with plant and machinery, the businesses in my constituency would benefit, as they would supply the equipment.

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): Does the hon. Lady accept that the logic of her argument would prejudice software houses in her constituency at the expense of the manufacturing industries to which she referred? What conceivable economic rationale could there be for doing that?

Mrs. Campbell: That is a curious piece of logic, which I am at a loss to understand. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to explain it to me in detail at some stage. Of course I do not accept that investment in manufacturing industry necessarily means that the Government have to do something crazy such as refraining from investing in the computer industry.

Firms in my constituency could supply equipment such as scanning electron microscopes—which few firms in the world make—television transmitters and industrial motor vehicles. We need a thriving manufacturing industry, and the amendment would help that industry, so I hope that Conservative Members will accept it.

Mr. Nelson: The brevity of this debate has been no reflection on its profundity. I have been fascinated by the varied in-depth contributions which have been made on the back of the thoughtful amendment moved by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). I shall dispose of—or rather, deal with—the amendment by saying that it seeks to extend from one to two years the period over which allowances are available, which would have two important effects. First, it would increase the cost of the new relief by about £700 million over the next couple of years, at precisely the time when we can least afford it. The Committee will be aware that the increase in writing-down allowances provided for in the clause will already give rise to a yield cost of some £700 million over a couple of years, and the amendment would add a further £720 million in the period up to the year 1995-96.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: It would help the debate if the Economic Secretary could tell us how the figures are calculated.

Mr. Nelson: Of course, they have to be guestimates. We hope that they are accurate. It is inevitable that any assessment of the value of a written-down allowance relief has to be based on speculation as to the level of investment that will take place. We can gain some indication from trends—and we have, goodness knows, enough well-qualified people working in the Central Statistical Office and in the Treasury to come forward with a good idea. If it is different, I invite the hon. Gentleman to explain why it would be a lesser cost. Even if it were £200 million less, it would be a considerable addition on top of the substantial relief that the Government have already given.

Secondly, relaxing the time limit would severely weaken the incentive to bring investment forward. It is the case with all time-limited concessions that the peak of activity is concentrated in the period immediately before the measure is due to be withdrawn. Putting back the expiry date clearly defers the incentive to invest quickly before the relief runs out. For the medium term, our view remains that our policy of low rates of tax levied across a broad base is the right one for business. Once confidence is restored, special tax incentives should no longer be required. We therefore see no case for extending the period over which the allowances are to be made available on the basis of the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) spoke about the importance of the machine tool industry. I was most interested in what he had to say. He called for a strategy of more generous capital allowances for small and medium-sized enterprises. That is precisely what we have sought to do in extending the allowance to 40 per cent. I should also mention that in another clause we are increasing the up-front allowance for industrial and agricultural buildings.

he right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) welcomed the additional relief but called for more. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley, he suggested that some people liked to pay lower corporation tax while others liked enhanced capital allowances. Depending on the circumstances of a firm, one or other will be to its advantage. It is not surprising that there are different views. Our judgment remains that which we made in the mid-80s—that it is better to have much lower levels of corporation tax on the stream of profit and income than to have the special selection and second guessing which belie capital allowance policy.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Unlike some hon. Members who have spoken, I represent a manufacturing constituency. In all the factory visits that I make in the course of my rounds in Teesside, I have never heard any business suggest that it would be happier if corporation tax went up, even if there were an allowance. Firms which address me on the point want the allowance and the lower rate of tax. They do not want a higher rate of tax and an allowance. They are in favour of the Government's broad strategy of bringing corporation tax down and a little help as well. What has done far more than capital allowances to enhance investment in north-east industry has been Japanese inward investment into the region and the greater emphasis on quality and total quality management.

Mr. Nelson: My hon. Friend is a champion in the House for manufacturing industry in his constituency. He has proved yet again the importance that he attaches to those matters. His words speak for themselves.

The hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) spoke about recession in manufacturing industry in the midlands. He referred to the importance that he attaches to quality and competitiveness—something on which we agree entirely.

The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) spoke eloquently about the small, high technology firms in her constituency and also called for improved capital equipment incentives. We believe that an industrial strategy should rest not just on the delivery of low inflation and low interest rates, but crucially on their longevity. It is vital that we have a period of stability in which low interest rates and low inflation are sustained. If we can add low taxation and deregulation, and if we can build on the special help provided in the autumn statement and the Budget for the automotive industry, that should help many of the areas represented in this short debate.

For all these reasons, I hope that the Committee will agree that what we have brought forward is what the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has moved for two successive years and called for on behalf of the Opposition. The Government have delivered that—to acclaim, I hope, from both sides of the Committee. It is an expensive relief, and we do not feel able to go further tonight.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: There is a very large audience—supporters of the Government party—here tonight for this important discussion and I know that they will welcome the fact that I have copious notes with which to reinforce the arguments already put in this debate. I know that they will also welcome the fact that I have with me a copy of the Labour party's new document, "Making Britain's Future"—a document which clearly would inform a debate on capital allowances. Given the distinguished nature of the audience, I think it would be right to read the whole document into the record. However, I will not.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 115 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill (Clauses 42, 48, 52, 67, 115 and 183) reported, without amendment; to lie upon the Table.

Teesside International Airport

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

11.11 pm

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): I am delighted to have this opportunity to raise the future of Teesside international airport and its development and opportunities for development. In this debate I will seek to outline why the development of the airport goes hand in hand with the privatisation of the airport.

There are three reasons why this issue has taken on a new sense of urgency and vigour in recent days. First, at 11 am on Monday 10 May 1993—a date and time that will go down in history—an announcement was made by the Local Government Commission proposing the abolition of Cleveland county and the removal of Darlington from the county of Durham for administrative purposes.

The significance of this announcement is that Teesside international airport is owned jointly by Cleveland county council, with a majority stake of 60 per cent., and Durham county council, with a 40 per cent. stake. Hence, assuming that the Local Government Commission's proposals are accepted, the airport is heading for an uncertain period of transition as discussions take place with the new Durham authority and Darlington, Middlesbrough, Hartlepool, Stockton and Langbaurgh authorities to see whether they wish to take over the shareholding in the airport or to sell, and, if the latter, to whom.

The second reason stems from the decision of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his autumn statement to allow proceeds from capital assets disposed of in the current year by local authorities to be used for other capital projects in the county.

Call me an old-fashioned capitalist, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I think that county councils such as Cleveland and Durham seem to find it difficult enough to maintain our schools and roads, and look after the police and the fire brigade, without dabbling in what is a highly sophisticated and competitive business of running an international airport. Indeed, how often do I receive a clarion call from those local authorities that they are starved of resources. Many of my constituents and council tax payers in Cleveland and Durham may therefore be bewildered as to why these councils wish to retain £20 million of their assets and money tied up in an airport when they have failed to see a dividend on those assets in the past 20 years, and when schools and roads remain in a state of disrepair. The Chancellor's window of opportunity will not be open for long. That is why I am calling on Cleveland and Durham to put the interest of the airport and their council tax payers first by commencing discussions that will lead to the immediate sale of the airport.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): The control tower and the runway are in my constituency, whereas the reception buildings are in the neighbouring constituency of Sedgefield. The division between the two local authorities has been deleterious to the development of the airport which has amazing opportunities for developing the regional airport network around Europe, particularly with the growth of inter-regional links and the developing northern arc within the European Community as markets develop directly between different parts of the nation states without going through the south-east of England.

The other opportunity open to us in the north-east is provided by the over-capacity of the London airports which are unable to service the aircraft and provide the incoming transatlantic routes with the capacity they need and could be serviced equally well by regional airports such as our excellent one in Teesside. We are missing that opportunity because of the short-sightedness of the blinkered socialist directors of the airport authority that we are saddled with.

Mr. Bates: My hon. Friend has taken an interest in the development of Teesside airport and has long supported its privatisation, and I am grateful for his comments tonight.

Having mentioned privatisation, let me explain what I have in mind. The indecision and uncertainty which are bound to result from changes in the ownership of the airport could not come at a worse time for the 140 management and staff at Teesside airport who, under the leadership of Bob Goldfield, their new managing director, have brought the airport back from pre-tax losses of £240,000 in the financial year to March 1992 to a modest pre-tax profit of £134,000 in the year to March 1993.

Although the profit has to be placed in context as it does not take account of debt charges and includes a substantial amount as a result of NATO exercises based at the airport last year, I believe that the management of the airport should be given the chance to take full financial control of the enterprise—in other words, a management buy-out. Such a move would end a period of uncertainty, allow access to the financial markets for development capital and would present the management and staff with a golden opportunity which I have every confidence in their ability to exploit outside the fetters of municipal control.

The third reason why the airport should be privatised is so that capital can be available for the development of the airport to ensure that it can take full advantage of the opportunities thrown up by the liberalisation of EC aviation through the European Community's historic aviation package which came into effect on 1 January 1993 and which will establish a single market in aviation.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): I congratulate my hon. Friend on raising a matter which is of great interest to my constituents as well as to his. On EC liberalisation, does he agree that the end of the transitional arrangements of the liberalisation package will open up new opportunities for the airports to have routes from Belfast to Teesside and on to Brussels and that great opportunities are provided by the great demand for flights to the continent and that these opportunities can best be taken up if his proposals are put into effect in future?

Mr. Bates: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that important point. It has long been the view of many of us who have taken an interest in the development of the airport. Of a passenger throughput of some 345,000, some 200,000 was due to the British Midland service to Heathrow. Clearly, if the airport is to have a prosperous future, it will have to diversify and expand its European routes. It is beginning to happen already with British Northern developing services to Brussels and the package tours which will be introduced from next year.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Does my hon. Friend recognise that he is arguing not only for Teesside airport but for a principle? My area in the north-west contains Manchester airport—a leading regional airport which, even recently, has been given a second terminal following a £250 million investment. If released from local authority control, it too could take advantage of the liberalisation of the airways: it could expand far more, and serve people in the north-west—and even those further afield—better than it does now.

Mr. Bates: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Nothing that I have said this evening applies exclusively to Teesside; it could apply equally to many regional airports. Indeed, it applies to every local authority, not just to Cleveland and Durham. Airports such as East Midlands and Leeds are currently going through the process that I am advocating. Air traffic competition could be liberated.

I believe that Teesside has the potential to rival Newcastle as the north-east's major airport. Indeed, that was the recommendation of the Stratford report, commissioned by the then Minister for Aviation and Shipping, Mr. Clinton Davis, in 1978. The report went into great detail about which of the three regional airports —Teesside, Newcastle and Carlisle—should be designated the growth airport. That was in the days when the Labour party still believed in a centrally planned economy. We have been denied the opportunity to find out whether they still do; the Opposition Benches are empty.

The Stratford report recommended Teesside airport because of the scope for extending the 7,500 ft runway to carry the new Boeing 747s; because it was less likely to be fog bound, which is why it was used by the RAF as a base for Vulcan bombers until 1962; because the majority of potential passengers lived nearer to Teesside than to Newcastle or Carlisle; and because it benefited from more available air space than either of its rivals. However, when the report was published, its recommendation was overturned, and the prestigious category B status was given to Newcastle. Teesside was banded in category C.

It is interesting to consider the fortunes of the two airports since 1978, when that decision was made. In 1978, Newcastle airport had 880,000 passengers; the figure for Teesside was 321,000. Last year, Teesside airport had a passenger throughput of 345,000—an increase of just 7·5 per cent. In contrast, Newcastle airport's throughput had increased to 2 million—an increase of 127 per cent., almost 17 times the growth in passenger numbers at Teesside. That is why Newcastle was able to deliver a £1·5 million dividend to its owners last year, which I do not resent.

I am pleased to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) is present, as I am sure that he takes a considerable interest in the matter. I do not begrudge that money to his authority; none the less, it will be a long time before Cleveland and Durham receive anything in return for their investment in Teesside airport. They have said that the prospect of a dividend remains "a long-term goal".

Another aspect of the airport that must be mentioned is the 250 acres of prime development land on the site. That land could be developed as a business or technology park were it not for planning restrictions which insist that any development should be airport related. Airport related! My only prerequisite is that any investment should be related to prosperity and jobs. If the councils will not make the decision to remove that restriction, Teesside development corporation should be allowed to expand its area of operation to cover the airport and ensure that planning decisions are not political decisions, just business decisions.

Here we have an airport that has been a victim of 1970s-style central planning whose resources for development have been limited by local authorities but which serves a dynamic and developing area. Its management have the skills to turn the airport into a profitable venture within a year. The Chancellor has provided a golden opportunity for local authorities to sell their stake in the airport and to use the proceeds to benefit the communities that they serve. We have the third European Community aviation package which gives huge potential for the development of air traffic.

Our plea this evening is clear. For stability, for success, for Teesside, we appeal to Cleveland and Durham county councils to release this venture from the dead hand of municipal government and allow the professionals and private capital to develop the airport into a fitting gateway to the most dynamic industrial area in the country, Teesside.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Steve Norris): May I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) on bringing forward this important subject this evening. I recall that he and I were denied a breakfast-time rendezvous on the Consolidated Fund Bill just before Christmas to discuss this issue and I fully recognise his concern about the airport and its future. I am delighted to see my hon. Friends the Members for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) and for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and I are somewhat of an endangered species these days as probably the only two living Tory by-election victors in existence or, should I say, not in captivity. Perhaps that is inappropriate. Perhaps I should have said "in captivity". Nevertheless, I am delighted to see him here and to welcome his contribution and also to see my hon. Friends the Members for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), not forgetting the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) who, I know, takes a tremendous interest in all these matters.

Teesside airport operates as a public airport company, Teesside International Airport Ltd. The company acquired the airport undertaking, property and certain other assets and liabilities from Cleveland and Durham county councils on 1 April 1987 under part II of the Airports Act 1986. The company is therefore, as my hon. Friend says, wholly owned by the two county councils and it is very much a public sector entity.

Our general attitude towards regional airports is that we want them to develop and prosper, handling all the traffic that they can attract, not only for the benefits that they can bring for those who live in the regions but for the contribution that they can make to relieving pressure on the London airports.

The area in which Government are uniquely well placed to help is in international negotiation. For nearly a decade the United Kingdom has put the opening up of new routes high on the agenda and major changes have been delivered, especially within the European Community. Since 1 January this year traffic rights have been available for all Community air carriers to operate air services on virtually any route within the Community, whether scheduled or charter, passenger or cargo. Complex procedures for approving fares have been swept away. We have created a climate in which air services and fares can become more competitive and more responsive to what the customer wants.

I am very proud of the role that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State played during the time of the British presidency in pressing these important issues to the stage where the third liberalisation package represents a major advance in the progress of the single market and is an issue in which Britain has consistently been in the lead.

Coming closer to home, I wonder if I may detain my hon. Friends with just a word about the concern that I know the managers at Teesside airport feel over what they see as a risk to the continuation of services to London, particularly to Heathrow. I understand the desire of airports like Teesside to maintain strong air services with the capital—at the moment, Teesside has five flights to Heathrow each weekday—and I have no doubt that the local community, especially businesses, will do all that it can to support this provision of services. The management of the airport also has a role to play through the provision of good quality airport services for people to enjoy as they connect with their flights. But I am bound to say that I agree with the recent Civil Aviation Authority report which said that those sorts of service, although clearly important for the regions that they serve, must stand up commercially and that there are no grounds for distorting the air services market to "protect" those regional services to congested airports.

I want to make a number of points in the debate and I will, of necessity, cover them only briefly. First, the decision on which routes to serve is now very much one for the commercial decision of airlines. The present system of take-off and landing slot allocation and regulation at our busiest airports means that airlines can continue to operate their existing services for as long as they wish to, because the slots they hold and operate carry historic rights, sometimes referred to as "grandfather rights". I can assure my hon. Friend that British Midland can therefore continue to operate the service between Teesside and Heathrow for as long as it wishes. I have no reason to believe that British Midland has any intention of withdrawing that service.

Although some of our regional airports have seen their services to London cut, there is none the less a healthy market in the provision of air services between London and the regions. It must be for the providers of those services, the airlines themselves, to decide whether it is in their commercial interest to continue to do so. Certainly, it would not be right for me to dictate from Marsham street what level of services should be provided to each point or, as the Teesside airport managers suggested to the CAA, what level of subsidy should be paid to airlines to maintain those services. We have been down that path before and, frankly, it does not work. Unnecessary, artificial market constraints or supports inevitably lead to artificial and unsustainable markets. In a market-led air transport industry geared to meeting passenger needs carriers must retain the ability to adjust their services and schedules in response to changes in consumer demand.

Mr. Nigel Evans: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important not only to maintain the links between the regional airports and London, but to establish and reinforce the links between regional airports and the international airports? I am thinking of Manchester here. There are many people who do not wish to travel from the regions down to London to take international flights. They would far prefer to take their flights from the areas in which they live to the destination to which they wish to go.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is right. As I said at the beginning, the Government's attitude is very clear. First, passengers should dictate where air services are provided. I agree with my hon. Friend that there is a great deal of good sense in avoiding the congestion around the major London airports. Heathrow is not the only airport that serves London. None the less, my hon. Friend is entirely right that where there is an opportunity for passengers to travel via Manchester, and it is in the operators' interest therefore to provide those services, the present Government would certainly see no difficulty whatsoever in encouraging that and in a sense providing a regime in which British Midland or any other operator can build on those services and offer to service local businesses.

On that question—this is related somewhat to that issue—I know of suggestions that we should use article 9 of the EC regulations effectively to ring-fence slots for airports such as Teesside at Heathrow. I do not believe that that would be valuable. First, I do not believe that it could ensure the survival of a particular service. One can ring-fence the slot, but ring-fencing the slot in no sense guarantees that the service itself can continue. That must be a matter for the commercial decision of the operators. In any event, ring-fencing slots for specific services introduces the kind of rigidity into the slot allocation system that we believe would be wholly unwelcome.

I suspect that many regions would want the slots for their Heathrow services ring-fenced. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already had representations from places other than Teesside wanting ring-fencing. Incidentally, ring-fencing relates to slots at particular, specified times and not just an overall daily total. Clearly, if we were to respond to all those demands we would impose an intolerably restrictive regime at Heathrow.

One point that I often make when we consider this subject is that British Midland, for example, has managed to increase the proportion of slots that it holds at Heathrow from 3 per cent. in 1979 to 14 per cent. now. That has happened despite the existence of grandfather rights. Grandfather rights, however much they may seem to entrench existing users of slots, none the less provide a regime in which there is a regular changeover of operators, as individual operators respond to where they think market opportunities are and withdraw capacity from certain routes to make it available to others. The less we do to make rigid slot allocations the better. That will ultimately help airports such as Teesside, which will not be disadvantaged.

Teesside is not an especially isolated area. I always point out that there is an excellent train service which takes only two and a half hours to King's Cross on the east coast main line which, as my hon. Friend will know, has recently been improved through electrification at a cost of £550 million. In addition, both Newcastle and Leeds-Bradford airports are within 60 miles by road of the Teesside area and offer flights not only to Heathrow, but to other European destinations, such as Amsterdam or Paris.

It is too easy and too tempting to focus on Heathrow to the exclusion of all the facilities around London. Heathrow, as I said, is not the only London airport. Gatwick, Stansted and London City airport, which I always mention when I can, are excellent airports which offer excellent connecting flights to many international destinations.

My hon. Friend referred to the proposals for the demise of Cleveland county council—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] That is clearly a popular proposition in the House this evening. As my hon. Friend said, the Local Government Commission's draft recommendations for Cleveland and for Durham were put out to public consultation earlier this week. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and other Transport Ministers have foreseen some complications for transport if shire counties are abolished, although their retention is not necessarily the best solution. I understand that Teeside airport is not specifically mentioned in the draft recommendations. I anticipate that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will draft regulations to cover issues such as the transfer of property rights and liabilities of any authorities that cease to exist. There are well-tried arrangements for transfers to successor local authorities. Meanwhile, if the airport company has any views, it should make them known to the Local Government Commission as part of the public consultation process.

My hon. Friend spoke about privatisation. The thrust of what both he and our hon. Friends asked was why we did not require local authorities to dispose of their airport interests. I know that my hon. Friend is an assiduous reader of Hansard, so he will know that I answered a question tabled by our hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on precisely that subject earlier this week. We have made no secret of the fact that we want to encourage local authorities to sell their airport interests. We believe that privatisation would bring benefits to local authority airports, as it has brought benefits elsewhere. We believe that it would encourage enterprise and efficiency and that it would enable airports to build on the advantages that the creation of the public airport companies provided. We believe, too, that the private sector has the resources and the willingness to invest in local authority airports on a far greater scale than we have seen so far. The British Airports Authority was privatised in 1987 and it has gone from strength to strength since. It has maintained a high level of investment, not just in the south-east, but in Scotland, too.

The Government have helped Teesside airport over the years by issuing borrowing approval to its controlling authorities for operational investment in the airport. However, with the increasing pressure on public expenditure, we are simply unable to maintain our support for investment in local authority airports on anything like the scale of recent years. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear, in his announcement following the autumn statement, that the amount of public expenditure provision available for local authority airports in the future will be limited—only £12 million this year—and that his first priority will be to enable airports to make necessary safety and security-related investment.

[Mr. Norris]

My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh referred to development proposals for the unused land at Teesside. My Department has not seen any development proposals involving opening access to the south side of the airport, and I can well understand that the cost of roads and other infrastructure there could be substantial. I know that the airport company is discussing with the county councils the possibility of their providing the access road and services. For the sort of scheme which the airport company is thinking about, the best course may be for a joint venture project to be established with the private sector to take that development project forward. In any event, there is no prospect of development of that sort being funded through supplementary credit approvals for the airport company.

We believe that it is for the local authorities which own airports to decide whether to dispose of their interests, taking into account the needs of those who live in the areas involved and the customers who use the airport. In taking those decisions, local authority shareholders will be aware that, if they want their airports to continue to develop, they will need to use internal resources or look to the private sector to fund major expansion. We have talked on many occasions about joint venture companies. In other cases, the private sector may be able to provide a specific facility, instead of the airport company. In many cases, the best approach will be simply the sale of majority holdings in public airport companies.

My hon. Friend made the important point that there is the temporary relaxation in the rules for the use of capital receipts which applies to the proceeds of the sale of shares in public airport companies. That provides a particular attraction to them in selling now. We greatly welcome the fact that the major shareholders in East Midlands airport have decided to test the market for their shares.

I have a great deal of sympathy—as I know my hon. Friends have—with what my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh said about Teesside airport. I pay tribute to the concern that he has expressed on this subject over a long period. I hope that Teesside and other airports will recognise the considerable opportunities and advantages that are available to them from pursuing the sort of policies which my hon. Friend has outlined this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty minutes to Twelve midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Child Abuse

1. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to receive the results of the independent research he has commissioned on the use of video-recorded evidence in child abuse cases; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Michael Jack): We expect to receive the results in January 1995.

Mr. French: Is my hon. Friend aware that, up to last month, there were only seven examples of the use of video evidence in child abuse cases? Does he agree that this form of evidence giving not only enhances the prospect of a safe conviction, but involves minimum extra trauma for the children concerned? Will he seek to promote it, and also consider its relevance to other offences—for example, rape?

Mr. Jack: I thank my hon. Friend for raising the issue. I know that he has campaigned assiduously in his constituency. Let me update him: pre-recorded pre-trial interviews with children have now been presented as evidence in 22 cases, and to date none has been refused. I assure my hon. Friend that we are considering the development of this important way of giving evidence. A new pack has been issued to help and educate children in the act of giving witness evidence; once we know more about this method—which is the aim of the report—we shall consider extending it in due course.

Mr. Allen: Will the Minister pass my congratulations to his interdepartmental team, and in particular to the Department of Health? They have done some very good work.

Will the Minister go a step further? Does he accept that there is a great deal of concern about the disparate quality of research? Will he try to pull the research together in a national centre, and perhaps set up regional centres for both abusers and, more important, the abused? If he were prepared to do that—or, at least, to undertake to review the policy—he would bring great relief to the hundreds of thousands of victims of child and, indeed, sexual abuse, whose lives are being blighted.

Mr. Jack: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his responsible attitude to this development, which is a product of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. I know from my visits to, for example, the Kent police's vulnerable victims suite that many police forces are now developing a particularly sympathetic and careful way of dealing with such evidence, and I am sure that they will discover more cases of child abuse as a result. Much of what has been done now needs to be evaluated; during that excercise, I shall bear in mind what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Riddick: The use of video-recorded evidence is, of course, very helpful, but would it not also be beneficial to abolish the right to silence in child abuse cases? That would also be useful in terrorism cases. Is it not time that juries were allowed to draw an inference from a suspect's refusal to say where he was or what he was doing at a certain time? The innocent will have nothing to hide. Is not the right to silence the criminal's best friend?

Mr. Jack: I know from earlier exchanges how many right hon. and hon. Members are troubled about that. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has received a copy of the report by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which deals with some of the issues. Although the report reached no firm conclusions, we have read it carefully and will consider its findings, together with the Royal Commission on criminal justice, whose report will doubtless include comment on the important point that my hon. Friend has raised.

Women-only Bus Services

2. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his policy towards the provision of women-only bus services operated in the evening.

Mr. Jack: My right hon. and learned Friend is always anxious to encourage initiatives such as this which seek to address the problems of crime and the fear of crime.

Mr. Cryer: If the Home Secretary is so anxious about providing evening-only services for women such as the Homerunner bus service in Bradford, which has had to be withdrawn, why does he not provide a grant, which has been provided for about three years? The sum of £18,000 will get that bus back on the road and provide 300 or so women each week who use the bus service with a safe service once again. That would be about the cost of the Home Secretary's chauffeur-driven car—looking at the right hon. and learned Gentleman's figure, I think that he could do with the exercise. He should cancel the car and donate the money to keep the women of Bradford safe.

Mr. Jack: As I am sure we shall see later, my right hon. and learned Friend is a man who is light on his feet. In fairness, the safer cities project in Bradford has been generous with its support. We originally gave a grant of £24,500 to the project in January 1990, on the proviso that funding would be raised locally. As it was not, a second grant was given in 1991 to do the same thing. To help still further, a third grant of £18,000 was given in 1992. We have bent over backwards to sustain the service, which is caught up in the general debate in Bradford about safer cities. On 12 March 1993 the Telegraph and Argus stated that we should not allow the momentum generated by the Bradford safer cities projects to be lost. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support that view.

Police Duties

4. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps are being taken to monitor the amount of policemen's time spent on beat duty, administrative and other matters.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The Government have encouraged and assisted police forces to introduce standard activity sampling as a way of monitoring the time that police officers spend on beat duty, administrative and other matters. In addition, as I announced last week, we are launching an urgent study into ways of reducing the paperwork burden on the police.

Mr. Shaw: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply, and I recognise that the Government are trying to make strides in that area. My constituents in Dover and Deal, and the many country villages, want see policemen on the streets—they want them to be a visible presence. They want to see the bobby back on the beat. Will my right hon. and learned Friend make every effort possible to ensure that bobbies are not tied down by administrative work in the police station?

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right in his analysis of what his constituents would like to see. I am pleased to be able to remind him that Kent police have the highest proportion of their policemen on beat and patrol duty of any provincial force bar Surrey—they already have a good record.

The reason that I decided to institute a study of the paperwork burden on the police service was to ensure that we could reduce to the necessary minimum the amount of time spent behind desks carrying out paper-related duties when arrests and prosecutions take place. We want to ensure that the biggest proportion of police time is spent on beat and patrol duty, with the police visible to the public of Kent and elsewhere.

Mr. Miller: I am sure that the Home Secretary will share the concerns expressed on both sides of the House about the increasing levels of serious crime, especially in areas such as my own in Cheshire. Against that background, will the Home Secretary state why the head of the regional crime squad in Cheshire, Detective Superintendent Holt, together with Detective Sergeant Goulding and Detective Constable Lamble are currently confined to desk duties? Will the Home Secretary ensure that every effort is made to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion as it not only affects public confidence in the force, but relates to matters that appear to imply a serious miscarriage of justice?

Mr. Clarke: Obviously, the individual disposition of officers is a matter for the chief constable, not me, but I shall make inquiries into the present status of the case in Cheshire referred to by the hon. Gentleman and write to him if I can give him any up-to-date information. It is sometimes necessary to suspend officers or confine them to desk duties when allegations are made against them. I am extremely concerned that, when they occur, investigations should be carried out as rapidly as possible and fairly. I am always anxious to ensure that such complaints and disciplinary measures are brought to a conclusion as quickly as possible.

I have already put out a consultative document about disciplinary procedures in the police force. Although parts of it are controversial, most people agree that it is wrong from the point of view both of the public and of the police officers concerned that the process should become too protracted and legalistic and come to no conclusion for too long.

Mrs. Angela Knight: My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware of the difficulties that the Derbyshire police force has to bear as a consequence of adverse decisions taken by the county council. Does he agree that his proposals to allow greater freedom for both police authorities and chief constables will result in more bobbies on the beat, which is what my constituents in Erewash want?

Mr. Clarke: We have proposed stronger police authorities than there have been hitherto. I think that Derbyshire shows the need for a stronger police authority than its county council has been able to provide. We have also proposed that those stronger police authorities and chief constables should have far more discretion in how they deploy their resources. I am sure that, when these and the other reforms come into effect, the chief constable of Derbyshire, his force and the police authority will respond to the wish of the people of Derbyshire for a visible police presence on patrol, providing a sense of security and effective protection against crime for the people of Erewash and elsewhere.

Mr. Blair: Is not one part of ensuring that there are more police men and women on the beat, which is what everyone wants, the need to build in proper incentives and esteem for the police constables who will be carrying out this duty? Will the Home Secretary therefore undertake, as part of the inquiry being conducted by Sir Patrick Sheehy, to ensure that such incentives are built into the terms and conditions of employment of police, so that more of them are encouraged to go on the beat?

Mr. Clarke: I have had only informal contacts with Sir Patrick and his colleagues throughout the inquiry, because it is an independent inquiry, but I have given him my views on a number of subjects—views identical to those just expressed by the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that Sir Patrick and his team will bear them in mind when coming to their conclusions. It is important that rewards be distributed fairly to reflect the responsibilities borne by officers, and that the responsibilities of beat and patrol officers, whom the public rate most highly of all, be properly taken into account in the rewards system.

Parental Responsibility

5. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures his Department has taken to make parents more accountable for the behaviour of their children.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: From 1 October last year, courts have new powers to bind over the parents of offenders under the age of 16, order parents to attend court with their children and to pay their children's fines.

Mr. Arnold: Is it not wrong that a tiny minority of parents allow their children to run riot, to the detriment of their neighbours and of other victims? Is not punishing the parents for the crimes of their children a deterrent and a way of making them face up to their responsibilities? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that describing these measures as "punishing the innocent" as the Opposition did when voting against them, is wholly wrong?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. Of course, many parents are decent people who do their best with their children but, for one reason or another, they cannot retain control of a child that becomes delinquent. The courts will not impose penalties on such parents. There are also parents, however, who neglect the behaviour of their children and just assume that it is up to the police and the courts to protect the public from them. I therefore think that one of the best features of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, about which I shall be making a statement in a few moments, was the fact that it gave these powers to the courts. It is indeed ridiculous that this was about the only part of the Act that the Opposition chose to oppose.

Mr. Maclennan: Would the Home Secretary take time to familiarise himself with the Scottish system for dealing with offenders which, through the children's panels, involves parents closely from the beginning of a case and appears to have rather greater success than the English juvenile courts system in preventing recidivism?

Mr. Clarke: I was in Scotland yesterday afternoon and evening, and overnight until this morning. I took the opportunity of doing a little public sounding of my own among the Scotsmen and women whom I met. I apologise for the fact that my sample was not fully politically representative; but the Scottish children's panels have met a rather more mixed reaction than I would have expected. Not everyone agreed that the situation in Scotland is nearer perfection than it is here.

Obscene Publications Act 1959

6. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete his current review of the operation of the Obscene Publications Act 1959.

Mr. Jack: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to be in a position to announce the conclusions of that exercise shortly. It will lay particular emphasis on ways in which the enforcement of the Obscene Publications Act 1959 can be made more effective.

Dr. Spink: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer, and I am pleased that he is considering ways to prevent that degrading material from escaping the law. How will his review impact on "Juliet", a book which our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister described recently as "truly horrifying" and which the Attorney-General refused to prosecute because of the deficiencies in the 1959 Act?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend has taken a leading part in drawing the attention of the House to such matters and will know that they are for the Crown Prosecution Service. I remind him that, in 1991, there were 218 successful prosecutions under section 2 of the Obscene Publications Act. As far as the weight of our review is concerned, we want to hit the pockets of pornographers hard, and to make the operation of the Act more effective. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said, however, a full-scale review of all the problems of the 1959 Act, which my hon. Friend knows well, is not necessarily the best way to achieve what he wants.

Mr. Alton: Does the Minister accept that obscenity, in its widest sense, also includes violence? As he knows, the dissemination of violence is widespread, especially through television programmes—many of which are broadcast before the watershed—and soaps, which broadcast incest, murder and all sorts of violence as though they were part of everyday living. That sort of obscenity also needs to be examined in the context of his review. Now that more than 100 Members from many parts of the House have signed an early-day motion calling for an inquiry into the link between television violence and violence in society, does he not think that that sort of review is urgently needed?

Mr. Jack: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have noted from public statements made by the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary that we take what he said very seriously, and I associate myself with those comments. Yesterday, I was in discussion with the Video Standards Council, which said much the same as the hon. Member. One of the little known facts about the 1959 Act is that the term "corrupt and deprave" can apply equally to violence and to pornographic material.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: While I note that my hon. Friend and his Department have resisted calls for a fundamental review of the 1959 Act and are merely considering its enforcement, will he take it from me that that will not bring about the success—a change in the law—that he has said he wants? Does he accept that he will have to review the test of obscenity in the 1959 Act, that unless he does so no other legislation will be as strong as he would wish, and that it is about time that the Government undertook a fundamental review and brought before the House changes to improve and strengthen the outdated and flawed Obscene Publications Act?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend is right to use the word "outdated" in her question. Because of the exhibition that she helped to stage in the House, she knows that pornography is being disseminated by new high-tech means and by information technology, and those are the areas that we must hit hard; improving the effectiveness of the operation of the 1959 Act is one of the best ways to deal with that. She will also know that the Government have a long-standing commitment that, if someone introduced workable alternative through private Members' legislation—the 1959 Act was such a piece of private Members' legislation—we would consider it very carefully.

Police Reorganisation

8. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he has had in relation to the reorganisation of police forces in Wales.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Wardle): None, because my right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to reorganise police forces in Wales.

Mr. Morgan: Following last week's election results, which removed from Tory control all but one of the shire counties in England—almost as good as Wales, where we have been a Tory-shire-county-free zone since 1981—can the Home Secretary assure the House that he will not seek to take petty revenge on the electorate by removing all forms of democratic accountability from police forces when the boundaries are reorganised? How does he propose to align the boundaries of police authorities with the new boundaries of the unitary authorities as and when we get them in Wales—or is he going to tell the House that the only form of democratic accountability that he sees in the future for police forces in Wales and in England is his own, larger-than-life personality?

Mr. Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary set out his proposals for the membership of police authorities in the statement that he made to the House on 23 March. The hon. Gentleman will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has proposed a single tier of unitary authorities, which fall within the existing police areas, except in one instance where it crosses the boundaries of Gwent and South Wales. We shall have to consider in due course whether to adjust police areas to match new local government boundaries.

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that the greater flexibility and freedom proposed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has been warmly welcomed by the chief constable of Dyfed-Powys? In considering what the force areas should be, will he give attention to the importance of smaller forces, particularly the Dyfed-Powys force which, according to figures recently published by the Home Office, has the best clear-up rate in the country?

Mr. Wardle: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. The Dyfed-Powys force stands at the top of the league of clear-up rates for the whole of England and Wales. He may have seen—as I have been made aware of it—the chief constable's paper on the size of police forces. In his statement on 23 March, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary proposed to simplify the statutory procedures by which forces can be amalgamated. He made it clear that he has no fixed, preconceived ideas about either the right number or the right size of police forces.

Mr. Michael: Perhaps the Minister can explain why the Home Secretary wants an accelerated process to deal with police mergers. We do not believe that his intentions are so innocent. Will the Minister accept that, after a 121 per cent. increase in crime under the Conservatives in Wales and in England, the last thing that the police or the public want is the diversion of a major reorganisation? They certainly do not want police authorities chaired by right-wing commissars parachuted in by ministerial decree. Will the Minister give priority to supporting the police, local authorities and communities in their efforts to reduce crime and to fight crime, and note that the smallest forces—not just Dyfed-Powys but Gwent—have the best clear-up rates?

Mr. Wardle: The hon. Gentleman will have noticed that the increase in crime in 1992 in Wales was marginally less than the average for England and Wales as a whole. He spoke about the procedures that alllow amalgamations. I hope that he has done his homework and looked at the legislation introduced in the 1960s, which makes the approach to any such amalgamation proposals very complex. That is why my right hon. and learned Friend proposes to simplify those procedures, and he will deal with possible amalgamations as and when they should arise. The hon. Gentleman forgets that the proposals for the reform of the police service are aimed at strengthening the ability of police forces to protect the public, to prevent crime where they can do so and to tackle crime when it occurs.

New Age Travellers

9. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department have taken to tackle the problem of new age travellers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We propose to strengthen section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986 to give the police stronger powers to prevent invasions by travellers and new powers to enable them to prevent illegal rave parties.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend will be aware that my constituents in Gloucestershire will be glad to hear that news. I informed him as long ago as the last May bank holiday weekend that we had a rave party in Lechlade, which cost the taxpayer well over £100,000; we had another invasion by travellers last weekend, which cost taxpayers over £200,000. My constituents in Gloucestershire barricade their homes and their land to prevent such huge invasions. Is he aware that they are now looking to the Government to take action to amend section 39 of the Public Order Act?

Mr. Wardle: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the distress caused by large rowdy gatherings of travellers and ravers whose selfish behaviour intrudes on other people's private lives, but I hope that he acknowledges that there have been two key developments since last summer. First, as my right hon. and learned Friend has announced, we intend to strengthen the Public Order Act and apply it to a wider range of circumstances. We also propose to give the police new powers to protect local communities from illegal gatherings. Secondly, the Association of Chief Police Officers has established two co-ordination centres for intelligence gathering on travellers, and has made arrangements for much closer liaison and mutual aid to tackle just such problems. Those centres were put to good effect in the Cotswolds during the bank holiday weekend at the beginning of May.

Mr. Trimble: Does the Minister appreciate that problems with raves are not confined to those that take place in the open air, but also affect those that take place on certain premises? The existing licensing legislation and the penalties connected therewith are wholly inadequate and need to be greatly strengthened.

Mr. Wardle: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. He will be aware that another piece of legislation is involved there, but if he cares to make representations they will be listened to carefully in the Home Department.

Car Crime

10. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what innovation his Department is considering to tackle car crime.

Mr. Jack: My advisory committee on car crime is looking at devising new ways to encourage a greater take-up of car security systems. Those efforts will be supported by the continuation of our successful car crime prevention campaign.

Mr. Whittingdale: Is my hon. Friend aware that immobiliser devices such as those produced by the Immobiliser group in Chelmsford are proving extremely effective in preventing car crime and are also now affordable? Does he agree that if more motorists spent a few extra pounds installing such devices that would have a major impact in reducing car crime?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend succinctly underlines one of the key messages that helped to make car crime prevention year a success. At the start of the year, car crime was rising at a rate of 18 per cent. but by the end of the year the rate of increase had dropped to 3 per cent. and the increase in thefts of cars—immobilisers are relevant to that statistic—was only 1 per cent. We are now renewing our campaign and I am sure that that message will form a key part of it.

Mr. Faulds: Why can the car industry itself not make a greater contribution to the prevention of car crime?

Mr. Jack: If the hon. Gentleman had been with me at the fleet motor show recently he would have seen that most of the models now available in the United Kingdom come fitted with alarms, immobilisers and other security devices. Those are extremely effective and major buyers such as fleet users are seeing great success when they purchase cars with such equipment.

Mr. Sykes: Is my hon. Friend aware that recently on television a member of the North Yorkshire probation service referred to the prisoners in her charge as "clients"? Should we not stop listening to the so-called experts and start doling out punishments that fit the crime rather than the criminal?

Mr. Jack: I assume that behind my hon. Friend's question is the idea of the persistent young car thief. The Home Secretary's announcement that he will introduce a secure training order to deal with persistent young criminals, many of whom are car thieves, goes to the heart of my hon. Friend's question.

Crime and Unemployment

11. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will initiate new studies into the causes of crime and its relationship to unemployment.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): Work on that subject was covered in the Home Office research study, "Trends in crime and their interpretation", published in 1990 and I have no current plans for fresh research in that area.

Mr. Skinner: I regard that as shocking complacency on the part of the Government. Everyone knows that young men and women are without jobs; there are 500,000 of them on schemes and a further 500,000 waiting to leave school who cannot be motivated by their teachers because they know that their brothers and sisters have not had a job for four or five years. Is it any wonder that in our area people still repeat the old adage that the devil makes work for idle hands? It is time that the Government got back to full employment or made way for a party that will create employment.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) gets carried away as he expresses his own prejudices rather than the truth. The study made it perfectly clear—I quote from the introduction by Dr. Simon Field—that the fluctuations in the total numbers of unemployed persons appear to be independent of the fluctuation in the number of offences. I will give the hon.

Gentleman an example that will appeal to his hon. Friends. When unemployment fell by 6 per cent. under the Conservatives in 1970-74, reported crime rose by 6 per cent. per year. When the Labour Government that followed the Conservative Government in 1974-79 saw unemployment rise by 17 per cent., reported crime increased by only 4 per cent. I expect the hon. Gentleman to tell me next that Labour unemployment is not merely better than Conservative unemployment, but is better than Conservative recovery as well.

Sir Anthony Grant: Will my hon. Friend reject once and for all the absurd myth that there is a direct link between unemployment and the rise in crime? Bearing in mind that before the war there was far greater poverty and unemployment, and far less crime, will he apply his mind much more to the real reasons, which are the breakdown in family life and, not least, the continual flouting of authority which is so much encouraged by Opposition Members?

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend is right, although I am sure that individual unemployment can be a precipitating factor in individual cases, and that areas of multiple deprivation are huge impediments to normal law-abiding life. These are complicated problems, which we are seeking to tackle with inner city programmes, most particularly city challenge. When one considers the people who have been convicted and are in prison, what strikes one particularly is the large proportion who have been in care. Up to 40 per cent. of young offenders in prison have been in care, compared with 2 per cent. of the population as a whole, and 30 per cent. of them were consistently truanting in their last years at school. Most of them, however, have had a job, although I have no doubt at all that for the large minority who have not a large part of the reason is that they think that honest work is a mug's game.

Ms Ruddock: No one on this side of the House deems that unemployment is any excuse for crime, but the Minister's last reply gave more considered attention to this issue. Is he aware that in London, in the poorest areas and those with highest unemployment, such as Southwark, Lambeth and Hackney, there are indeed the highest crime rates, particularly for robberies and burglaries? How does he respond to deputy assistant commissioner Roach of the Metropolitan police, who said:

"Crime trends are largely determined by social factors . . . over which the police have very little influence"?

I suggest that the Government have much control over many of those social factors and that it is time that they attended to them and really exerted some influence towards reducing the crime rate, particularly in the capital.

Mr. Lloyd: What is perfectly clear—I will send the hon. Lady the research if she has not seen it—is that, despite all our efforts over the years to find a connection between unemployment and crime, we have not done so. Nevertheless, as I have said, I have no doubt that unemployment and many other factors play a part in individual tendencies to crime. It is too easy for Opposition Members to blame unemployment. It is a complex vicious circle and, as I said in reply to my hon. Friends, the whole range of factors, particularly in the deprived areas of inner cities, needs to be tackled as a whole. That is exactly what the Government's inner city programmes seek to do. There is no single answer. Unemployment is certainly not a prime cause or a direct cause of crime. To say that it is such a cause is an insult to those who are unemployed and who would never indulge in crime.

Sentencing

12. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the right to appeal against lenient sentences.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Most of the representations I receive on the right of appeal against lenient sentences, which was introduced by the Criminal Justice Act 1988, are to indicate views on the outcome of particular cases.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that although the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) ludicrously tries to talk up his party as the party of law and order, the hon. Gentleman and his party voted against the measure? How can the British people take seriously Labour's pretension to support law and order when——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is calling into question the Opposition's policies. He must ask the Government about their policies, especially in relation to his substantive question.

Mr. Spring: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm the importance of ensuring that lenient sentences are referred and that we get the proper passing of sentences appropriate to the crime?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely endorse my hon. Friend's sentiments. He is right to recall that it was this Government who introduced the new power and enabled an appeal to be made against unnecessarily lenient sentences. It was used recently most notably when there was widespread public feeling about the sentence first imposed on a 15-year-old for an offence of rape in south Wales. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General used his powers under the Criminal Justice Act 1988 to go to the court and to get a proper sentence imposed. That power was introduced by this Government only a few years ago. My hon. Friend is right to recall that it was opposed by Opposition Members, including Opposition Front-Bench Members.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Is the Home Secretary aware that one of the main reasons why the courts have been concerned about lenient sentences is section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which the Government brought into force last October? When the Home Secretary gave evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs, he said that he did not intend to review the provision until a year had passed. Is not it the case that if he now intends to review section 29 and if he now accepts that there is inadequacy in the legislation that his Government passed to deal with crime, it is only because strong pressure to be tough on crime has come from the Opposition? Again, he has shown complacency.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) has just pointed out that the Labour party ferociously opposed the prosecution's right to appeal against sentences. My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) pointed out that Labour opposed the power of the court in the 1991 Act to take parents before the courts and to make them liable for the fines of their children. Section 29 of the 1991 Act was one of the measures to which the Opposition raised no opposition and which they supported. It is not working as Parliament intended. I have been saying for months that I intend to put the matter right as soon as I can. If the hon. Gentleman stays in the Chamber for about 20 minutes, he may get news which puts his mind at rest on the question.

Mr. Sweeney: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is Labour which has opposed every major piece of criminal justice legislation in the past 14 years?

Madam Speaker: Order. Some hon. Members will never learn. If the hon. Gentleman can ask a supplementary question that is in order, I shall of course want to hear him. I have selected him to speak.

Mr. Sweeney: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is a bit rich for Labour——

Madam Speaker: Order, I shall pass on. I selected the hon. Gentleman because he has a substantive question on the Order Paper and I thought that he might like to follow it up. I hope that he will understand if I now call Mr. Spellar.

Prisons (Private Security Firms)

13. Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the operation of prisons and the transport of prisoners by private security firms.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Private sector involvement in the Prison Service is designed to improve standards across the whole prison system.

Mr. Spellar: Has the Minister any comment on the death of Mr. Hogg in custody? Has he any comments on the use of untrained drivers by Group 4? What qualifications has Group 4 for the job, apart from its association with the chairman of the Conservative party? Can the Minister further confirm whether the Metropolitan police have been instructed not to tender for certain categories of jobs such as the transfer of prisoners in London? When will he drop the prejudice, sack Group 4 and let the job be undertaken by the professionals?

Mr. Lloyd: I will not say anything about Mr. Hogg other than that I regret very much—as does Group 4—his death, which is being investigated by the police and by the Prison Service. The hon. Gentleman has referred to Group 4. Its escorts have been conveying a thousand prisoners a week for the past six weeks, after a very unfortunate start —I accept that—for everyone but the cartoonists and the knee-jerk reactionaries on the Opposition Benches, when Group 4 lost eight prisoners in the first three weeks, of whom three at least did not escape due to its error. Group 4 has been doing its difficult and demanding job with increasing efficiency. Last year in that area the police and the Prison Service lost at least 30 prisoners, so Group 4 has a long way to go in losing prisoners before it catches up with the public sector. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lloyd: Opposition Members should restrain their laughter and note that Group 4 is releasing up to 150 highly trained police officers for operational duties in the public interest. Group 4 ought to continue and make a success of its work; only the anti-private sector vendetta of Opposition Members would be served by the cancellation of its contract.

PRIME MINISTER

Q1. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the levels of compensation paid out under the citizens charter demonstrate its effectiveness? Does he further agree that the moves to agency status and contracting out are the best way of achieving value for money? Does he also agree that it is not surprising that all those measures have been resisted by the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: As to the last part of my hon. Friend's question, I am unsurprised.

Paying compensation is popular with those who use public services. I also believe that it is right that compensation should be paid when service is bad. It provides a satisfactory discipline on the public services. As regards contracting out, I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. It has brought great benefits both to those who use public services and, critically, to those who pay for public services.

Mr. John Smith: Since the opposition of the whole teaching profession to the imposition of tests this year has been reinforced by the overwhelming vote by members of the National Union of Teachers in favour of a boycott, will the Prime Minister now do the sensible thing and suspend compulsory tests this year?

The Prime Minister: I was very sad this morning to see the result of the vote by the National Union of Teachers, which was the only teacher association not to welcome the statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education on Tuesday. A lot of people will be asking whether that union really supports the principle of regular testing in our schools or whether another agenda concerns it. I very much trust that the NUT will reflect on what my right hon. Friend said.

Mr. Smith: As the Secretary of State for Education was forced to concede that there were flaws in the tests, which is why he climbed down about next year, why on earth is the Prime Minister forcing children to take the tests this year?

The Prime Minister: What should be called off are the unprofessional and utterly futile boycott threats. Teachers should do what the majority of parents want—co-operate in helping to make the tests work this year and in future years.

On the second point of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's question, he will recall that he has asked me that before. Ron Dearing has made it absolutely clear that he needs the experience of this year's tests to redesign them satisfactorily for the future.

Mr. Smith: As there is overwhelming opposition to compulsory tests this year, from parents as well as teachers and governors, why does the Prime Minister not show a glimmer of common sense and end the farce now? If he is not listening to parents and teachers, whom is he listening to? Does he not understand that to be so foolishly stubborn is a sign of weakness and not of strength?

The Prime Minister: It is common sense to proceed with tests so that we can correct them and get them right in the future. Testing in schools is vital to measure the progress of the pupils concerned. The Opposition may wriggle, but that happens to be the reality. I hope that even, at this late stage, teachers will realise the importance to pupils of having these tests, the importance to the reform of testing of having those tests and the importance to the dignity of the profession of teaching in not proceeding with industrial action at the expense of schools.

Mr. Gorst: Is my right hon. Friend aware that since the Conservative Government came to office in 1979 membership of trade unions has fallen by 28 per cent? Will my right hon. Friend say whether he believes this is due to their being a growing anachronism, badly led, or merely because of their limpet-like, hand-in-glove connection with the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: I am certainly not inclined to disagree with any of my hon. Friend's points. Trade union membership does continue to decline and is substantially lower than it was a decade or so ago. I notice that many of the unions still sponsor right hon. and hon. Members on the Labour Front Bench and resist suggestions that they should abandon the out-dated block vote in favour of one member, one vote. It is a case of he who pays the piper calls the tune, and on this, too, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) is wriggling.

Q2. Mr. Burden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Burden: The Prime Minister will probably have heard that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said that he regrets "that inflation got out of control at the end of the 1980s."

Would the Prime Minister care to enlighten the House as to what jobs he was doing at the end of the 1980s?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman had cared to research very carefully, he would have known that we have made it clear on a number of occasions that after the 1987 stock exchange crash we reduced interest rates faster than, with hindsight, we thought was correct, and that contributed to inflation. The hon. Gentleman will also know that, at that time, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East and the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) both invited us to cut interest rates further and faster and that that would have put inflation up even more. The hon. Gentleman should do his research more accurately.

Q3. Mr. Jessel: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jessel: As the economy and business confidence have, under the Conservative Government, begun to improve—especially since Britain left the exchange rate mechanism—will my right hon. Friend give further support to business confidence by making it clear that the United Kingdom will not return to fixed exchange rates?

The Prime Minister: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has said, and as I made clear earlier this year, we will not consider rejoining the ERM before important conditions have been met, in particular the requirement that German and United Kingdom monetary policies must be much more closely aligned before we can begin to consider whether it would be appropriate for Britain to rejoin. Clearly those conditions are unlikely to be satisfied soon.

Q4. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Barnes: Some people still believe in the ultimate objective of a multi-ethnic democratic society, with full minority rights, for the former Yugoslavia. Included among them are many of the people of Yugoslavia who bravely stand out against violence and intimidation. Why do we not listen to some of their ideas for the extension of safe havens and United Nations border controls? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that not everyone in Yugoslavia is a supporter of paramilitarism and war lords?

The Prime Minister: We have indicated on a number of occasions in the House the way in which we think it is right for us to proceed at the moment. We have made that clear and we have said that we believe that it is right to continue to pursue a political settlement, without which no settlement can stick in the long term even though perhaps for a short while it might be held. We have made it clear that we believe that it is right to proceed with sanctions, and we have not ruled out the use of force, should that prove necessary, in selected circumstances.

Q5. Mr. Alan Howarth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that as economic growth strengthens and as our improved competitiveness, particularly in manufacturing, makes its impact, that will increasingly be appreciated by the voters, who will also note the nature of the Opposition parties —one inextricably tied to the big unions and big bureaucracy and the other without roots and no more than the scavengers of British politics?

The Prime Minister: Things have certainly been difficult for many companies and people throughout the recession. I understand that and have acknowledged it on a number of occasions. I believe that as recovery comes through, many of those people will see that it would not have come through unless we had taken the right decisions to get inflation down and keep it down for the future.

We can now see that manufacturing output is turning up, that manufacturing productivity is at record levels, that exports of manufactures are at record levels and that, according to the Confederation of British Industry, optimism in manufacturing industry has reached a 10-year high. They are very welcome signs. We are clearly coming out of recession in the right circumstances for sustained growth over a long period.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: When the right hon. Gentleman took the decision to withhold the helicopter carrier order from Swan Hunter Shipbuilders, he will have known that he was bringing shipbuilding on Tyneside to an end, so he will not be surprised to learn that at 1 o'clock today Swan Hunter called in the receivers and 6,000 people are now to lose their jobs on Tyneside. Will the Prime Minister help my constituents by telling them where they will find alternative work?

The Prime Minister: I think the hon. Gentleman knows that, of the two tenders submitted, that submitted by VSEL at Barrow was many tens of millions of pounds below the tender submitted by Swan Hunter. I understand the difficulties faced by Swan Hunter and, because I know of those difficulties, I agreed with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to bring forward that tender earlier than we would otherwise have done to see whether Swan Hunter could satisfactorily win the tender in open competition. I regret that it did not, but I am not in a position to reject a tender many tens of millions of pounds below that of the alternative tender.

The answer to the substantive second part of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question is that it is precisely because we are concerned about the employment prospects on Tyneside that we yesterday announced a range of measures to help, including a new enterprise zone, a new English Estates development in conjunction with the city council and the development corporation, more services from the Tyneside training and enterprise council and employment services, confirmation that Newcastle and South Tyneside will remain a development area, and extra resources for the Tyne and Wear development corporation for industrial sites.

I invite Opposition Members who scoffed when I mentioned the enterprise zone to look at other parts of the country that have faced similar difficulties in the past to see how effective that has been. They might, for example, recall the great difficulties at Shotton 10 years ago. If they go back to Shotton today, they will find a modern estate with high-paid, permanent, high-tech, secure jobs for just as many people as once worked in the steel industry there.

Q6. Mr. Ancram: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Ancram: Does my right hon. Friend agree that as well as the optimism to which he referred in yesterday's CBI survey, there are also real indications of growth and increased investment in most of the regions of the United Kingdom, including the south-west? Given that after three hard years of recession most people in my constituency, and elsewhere, want to see real, tangible proof of recovery, as well as promises of recovery, does my right hon. Friend welcome the report as a true indication of recovery which even Opposition Members cannot deny?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I do welcome the report and I hope that that encouraging trend will continue in the months ahead. It is encouraging that businesses right across the country themselves expect to grow strongly in the months immediately ahead of us—in the south-west, certainly, but also in the south-east, the midlands and right across the land. What we in the House all want, I think, without exception, is to see that growth translated into jobs and into money in the family pay packet.

Q7. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bruce: Does the Prime Minister accept that the campaign by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security to transfer payments from post offices to banks is totally inimical to the interests of those who live in rural communities? Will he ask the Secretary of State to call off that campaign? Does he further recognise that the privatisation of the Post Office will damage rural post offices and delivery services? Rather than postpone privatisation, will he now abandon it?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) last week, I believe, we have made no such proposals. Our policy is to encourage people to receive benefits via their accounts while maintaining a viable network of post office outlets.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. Time is up. Statement, Mr. Secretary Clarke.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. Points of order come after statements.

Criminal Justice

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the criminal justice system.

The House will recall that on 14 April it gave an unopposed Second Reading to the Criminal Justice Bill dealing with money laundering and other financial crimes. That Bill had already been considered in another place.

The House of Lords authorities had taken a narrow view on what was within the scope of the Bill. At the time of Second Reading in this House, I explained that I had been advised that we would therefore be unable to use the Bill to improve the working of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

However, two days ago I was told that the authorities of the House of Commons might take a different view. I therefore might now have an unexpected and welcome opportunity to bring before the House in this Session of Parliament amendments to give effect to commitments that I have already made to amend the 1991 Act. That Act is plainly not working as Parliament would have liked, and it is clearly in the interests of justice that I should move to put matters right quickly, now that I do have this welcome opportunity.

Subject to the approval of the appropriate authorities in the House, therefore, I intend to table amendments to the present Criminal Justice Bill which will deal with the problems of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 and also strengthen the powers of the courts in other important respects.

First, we will seek to amend section 1 of the 1991 Act so as to allow the courts to take into account all the offences for which the offender is being dealt with, instead of only one offence, or that offence and one other offence, which is the case now.

Secondly, we propose to restore to the courts their power to have full regard to the criminal record of an offender and his response to previous sentences when deciding on the sentence for his current offences. We will do this by repealing section 29 of the 1991 Act, which prevents a court from regarding an offence as more serious by reason of any previous convictions of the offender, or his failure to respond to previous sentences.

These changes, which I wish to see made to the 1991 Act, will make it clear that sentencers have all reasonable discretion to decide upon the right sentence in a particular case, bearing in mind the seriousness of the offences being dealt with, all the circumstances of the offender and his offending behaviour.

We will ensure that the law allows the courts to exercise judgment and common sense within a sensible legal framework that allows justice to be done in the interest of the public, the victim and the offender.

So far as fines are concerned, I am quite satisfied that courts should continue to have regard to the particular circumstances of individual offenders—in particular, to their means to pay—when fixing the level of a fine. I have been equally clear for some time, and I have frequently said, that we should not require magistrates' courts to go through the mechanistic provision currently required under the unit fine arrangements. My hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), Minister of State in my Department, and I have been seeking for some time modifications that we might make to the rules of the unit fines scheme to produce better results. We have now concluded that it is not possible to do so.

Accordingly, I now propose to abolish the unit fines system and replace it with provisions which will require magistrates fully to consider an offender's means when imposing a fine but which will not require them to fine by application of any mathematical formula. [Interruption.] I get the sense that this change will be widely welcomed, not least by magistrates outside the House.

I will also—again, subject to the judgment of the House authorities—seek to table further amendments to the Criminal Justice Bill currently before the House which will give to the courts the statutory power to increase sentence for those who offend on bail. We will also be seeking to fulfil our undertaking to increase the maximum sentence for causing death by dangerous or drunken driving from its present five years to a new maximum of 10 years' imprisonment.

There are many other improvements to the criminal justice system and the powers of the courts which I intend in due course to bring before the House. We are also awaiting the report of the Royal Commission on the criminal justice system. At this stage of this Session of Parliament, it would not be prudent to introduce more complex amendments to the law and new criminal offences which might require extended parliamentary debate. I hope to have an opportunity to introduce further criminal justice measures in fresh legislation in the reasonably near future.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): First, I welcome the Home Secretary's statement on the shambles of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. We are surprised, however, that he has not seen fit to make a statement specifically on the allegations that there has been illegal bugging of the conversations of the royal family—allegations that are directly relevant to criminal justice. I should like to put to the Home Secretary one question about this matter. Either the transcripts that are circulating are forgeries, in which case a serious offence of criminal fraud has almost certainly been committed, or they are genuine, in which case a gross intrusion of privacy by illegal—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. If hon. Members were listening to the statement of the Secretary of State, they will remember the final paragraphs. Will the hon. Gentleman keep that in mind?

Mr. Blair: Either these transcripts are forgeries, in which case a serious offence of criminal fraud has almost certainly been committed, or they are genuine, in which case a gross intrusion of privacy by illegal means has taken place. In either event, given that the Home Secretary is responsible for both criminal justice and issues concerning the royal family, are not these matters ripe for serious and urgent investigation, irrespective of the position of the security services?

I should like now to deal with the Criminal Justice Act. Never have we seen so quick a collapse of Government policy, even for the present Government. In dealing with the worst abuses of the Act, the Home Secretary will have much support. I am surprised that he did not pay tribute to the private Members' Bills of my hon. Friends the Members for Warwickshire, North (Mr. O'Brien) and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham).

I should like to press him on one central matter. Having spent weeks, if not months, robustly telling us that the Criminal Justice Act had a lot to commend it, he now equally robustly tells us that he must scrap its central provisions. Does he not understand that the problem with which the Criminal Justice Act sought to deal is arbitrary and inconsistent sentencing, and that it is therefore important that he should not scrap the Act and leave a dreadful hole?

Is there not therefore now a clear and urgent need for proper sentencing guidelines? Otherwise, the very difficulties that gave rise to his predecessor's legislation and the reasons for his support will recur, and one ill thought out proposal will simply be replaced by another.

May I also ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman why he is not trying to deal with other abuses of the criminal justice system? First, does he know that, because of the rising scandal of delays and adjournments in the criminal courts, it takes six months or more for many cases to reach a hearing? Is it not high time that the operation of the courts was overhauled thoroughly and they were run not for the convenience of those who administer the system but in the interests of justice for those who use it?

Secondly, does he know that, according to his own figures, the number of cases discontinued by the Crown Prosecution Service has risen by over 20 per cent. in a year? Is he aware of, and will he comment on, the concerns of the police and prosecution services that many cases are discontinued, not on public interest grounds or for lack of evidence but because of pressure on resources? Is that right?

Thirdly, is not one abuse of the system the treatment of victims? Why will the Home Secretary not support us in saying that the Crown Prosecution Service should be legally obliged, before dropping or amending charges, especially in cases of rape or assault, fully to consult the victim? Above all, will he confirm that the level of crime is such that only one in 23 cases ever results in a conviction or caution? Therefore, may I urge him once again to rethink his strategy on crime prevention and accept the advisory report that was published in his office two years ago?

There is little point in drawing attention, as the Home Secretary does, to the link between crime and drugs, and then cutting drug advisory posts. There is little use in worrying about the appalling rise in truancy, with tens of thousands playing truant every day, and cutting the funding for truancy officers in local authorities. There is little chance of young people learning self-respect when thousands of them have to leave school every year and face nothing better than a life on the dole.

May I tell the Home Secretary that there is a possibility of establishing a broad basis of action on criminal justice, but to do that the Government must learn not just to rectify sensibly the mistakes for which they were responsible in the past, but to think through a coherent policy for the future to fight both crime and its underlying causes, so that the plague that makes life hell for millions of people in local communities can be addressed with the seriousness of purpose which they desperately wish to see?

Mr. Clarke: I find the hon. Gentleman's choice of priorities in politics utterly absurd. We are considering extremely important matters about the powers of the courts to deal properly with offenders who appear before them. Yet he kicks off by making his first priority, presumably placed on behalf of the Daily Mirror, to try to sell rather sleazy royal books, asking me to inquire into ridiculous allegations for which he knows well that there is no shred of support. He is a tabloid politician, unable to turn his attention to serious criminal matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) is among those who have been pressing me for legislation to address the 1991 Act. I have been saying for some time that I do not like the way the Act has been working. Most hon. Members and magistrates do not like the way it has been working. We can now take action to get it into the shape that it ought to have been.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has kept his head down on the subject. A few moments ago, he gave those warnings about arbitrary sentencing, which were used in the speeches of his hon. Friends when they supported the legislation which tried to put in place mechanistic constraints on the courts, which in practice, as we all know, have not worked out properly. If he can turn away from royal scandals, buggings and matrimonial quarrels, he will have a chance to decide how he will vote on some things which matter to real men and women throughout the country.

I assume from what the hon. Gentleman has said that he will support the changes which I propose to the 1991 Act. I wish I always had that docile acquiescence from my opposite number on everything I propose. He has not yet made up his mind about bail and whether he approves of the proposal that we give the courts the statutory power to increase the sentence of those who offend on bail. [HON. MEMBERS: "What about Asil Nadir?"] Perhaps the thought that, when we get Mr. Asil Nadir back, we will give the court a power that it now lacks to add to the sentence if he is convicted and if he commits further offences while on bail will prompt Labour Members to support us, but hitherto they have not supported sensible propositions in this field at all.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield has not yet made up his mind whether to support the increased penalty for causing death by dangerous or drunken driving—we shall see where we get to on that proposal. He gave us his usual litany about how important it is to go back to the Morgan report and examine whether local authorities should have a statutory duty in crime prevention. As far as I can see, that is the only original insight into crime that the Labour party has had so far in its new guise.

When the hon. Gentleman says that cases are discontinued for lack of resources, he plainly ignores the amount of resources that we are putting into the police and criminal justice system. It may be the burden of paperwork which has been imposed on those who arrest, prosecute and take people from arrest to trial by various people with well-intentioned reforms over the years that needs to be addressed. That is why I have set up an inquiry into the matter—we look forward to the report. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the other matters to which he referred are not within my area, so I should not dilate on the drive that my right hon. Friend the Minister is having on truancy and the £10 million campaign that he has already carried forward.

Today, I have announced the next stage in a package of measures to give the courts a proper range of powers so that they can exercise their discretion, judgment, and mercy on occasions, as well as their proper regard for the public interest of others, when they deal with those who are brought before them. Labour Members have not given serious thought to the matter. Perhaps, when this Bill comes before the House, at least they will have the decency to allow it a reasonably quick passage in its amended form.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the Government have done much to strengthen the criminal justice system by one of the largest increases ever in appointments of Her Majesty's judges to the High Court bench? Does he further agree that his statement to the House today, arising from his listening to his colleagues on the Conservative Benches and the public more generally, will do more to engender confidence in the criminal justice system than ever before?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his reminder that we have strengthened the courts to deal with the weight of work before them—I am grateful for his support. His advice has been invaluable in our consideration of the way in which the Criminal Justice Act has been working. I look forward to having similarly constructive advice during the passage of this Bill and the other criminal justice Bills which we intend to introduce in due course.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Is it not utter gall on the part of the Home Secretary to attack the Opposition spokesman for seeking to catch headlines when the whole of this operation is designed to catch a headline, "Crackdown on Crime", in the face of escalating crime figures which are without parallel in our history? Is it not monstrous that he should bring forward a total reversal of policy, which was commended to the House only two years ago by another instant governing Home Secretary as the answer to the problem of inconsistency in sentencing, to further his own petty personal policies?—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Maclennan: At a time when the royal commission is reaching its final conclusions, the Home Secretary has the effrontery and lack of sense to introduce ill thought out measures at a time when he does not even know whether Parliament is allowed to consider them. Surely it is time that he sat on the back burner and allowed sensible debate to take place in the House.

Mr. Clarke: In response to the hon. Gentleman, I ask him to go away, lie down in a dark room, keep taking the tablets and think carefully about whether the Liberal Democrats have an opinion one way or the other on the merits of any of the proposals that I have just announced.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): The Home Secretary's announcement this afternoon will be warmly welcomed not only by my constituents but by the Police Federation and its members up and down the country. All hon. Members in the House, bar one or two, know that his common-sense decision to allow the courts access to previous criminal convictions must be right. I hope that it will help to put behind bars burglars who pester the private homes of all our constituents.

Can my right hon. and learned Friend tell us what proposals he has for restricting the bail granted to, in particular, young people, who often go through what the police regard as the revolving door of arrest, bail, further offending, bail and so on? How will that work?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who takes a close and continuing interest in matters connected with policing. I am happy to confirm that we will give the courts power to consider previous convictions, among other things.

The men and women we appoint to the bench, be they judges or magistrates, are expected to bring civilised common sense and judgment to their task. They must be allowed to examine all the relevant circumstances, the nature of the offence, the offender's background, whether he has committed crimes before and how he has responded to earlier sentences. They must bear those factors in mind when passing a sentence that matches the seriousness of the offences of which the offender is now guilty. I believe that that approach will be welcomed by serving police officers who take those whom they arrest to the courts, as well as by all right-thinking people who want justice to be done.

My hon. Friend also raised the extremely complex issue of the way in which out-of-control young people should be handled—for instance, how those who are currently given bail before being dealt with by the youth courts should be remanded. That question takes us into much more complicated areas. In many ways, I should like to present provisions related to the treatment of young people in the form of amendments to this year's Criminal Justice Bill. We are now in May, however; I have been given the unexpected and welcome news that the proposed amendments are acceptable, but I think that we shall have to wait for later legislation to tackle such a complex matter properly, thus satisfying the legitimate public concerns voiced by my hon. Friend.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I welcome the abolition of the unit fines system, but will the Home Secretary now apply his mind to the victims of the massive escalation of crime by funding victim support properly and on a proper basis, funding the youth service which literally keeps young people off the streets and recognising that local authorities can play a legitimate positive role in dealing with crime? Above all, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman urge his colleagues to provide 16-year-olds with benefit, jobs or at least some stake in the future? At present, they have none.

Mr. Clarke: We have built up the concept of victim support panels; I agree with the hon. Lady about their value. We continually increase the resources that we provide for such panels, and also give financial compensation to crime victims through the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Such compensation is now provided on a considerable scale. We are readdressing the quality of service and the promptness of the payments.

We have developed the idea of crime prevention panels, which is 25 years old. Youth crime prevention, however, is a particularly important issue, and we continue to support and build on the necessary measures in every possible way. I do not deny that local authorities can play a very useful role in crime prevention: indeed, such a role is played by authorities up and down the country. However, I dispute the narrow point about whether we should lay a new statutory duty on them. The hon. Member for Sedgefield seems to cling obsessively to that idea. It is not a great centre of policy, as he suggests; it is a footnote to activities that are taking place throughout the country.

Of course it is important for young people to have a purposeful occupation. That is why all the relevant agencies must be involved—local authorities, the education service, the police and others—and why we take every opportunity to support any measure that provides young people who may risk becoming offenders with the chance of some purposeful activity and outlet for their energies. None of that, however, avoids the need to give the courts the power they require to protect the public against those on whom such measures have no effect—those who desire to commit crime and who need to be punished in a way that the public consider fit.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Many people throughout the country will praise my right hon. and learned Friend for his willingness to admit that we have made mistakes. He has listened to the comments that have been made, and come forward to correct the errors.

May I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to try to find time to implement his announcement about secure training orders in the new amendments? Many people, particularly the police, are most concerned that we cannot deal with those young people aged between 12 and 15 who are consistently out of control, when the court has no power to lock them up or restrain them. If Government policy could move towards achieving that, it would be welcomed by both the police and the general public.

Mr. Clarke: I have announced my intentions, and I am grateful for my right hon. Friend's support. I have considered that specific factor, but I do not think that it would be sensible for me to place before the House authorities possible amendments on that issue, which requires greater development of the proposed legislation than can properly be considered in the House and another place in the time remaining in this parliamentary Session.

I do not think that it would save a great deal of time to seek to legislate now in a hurry, because we still have to develop the concept of such institutions. We must have places to which the hard-core persistent offenders can be sent where we can be sure that the regime is suitable for delinquent school-age boys, and is likely to give them the quality of education and training they require when they are locked up to prevent them from harming themselves and the public.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): In the light of the massive changes that the Home Secretary has announced today, where people have been fined £400 or £500 for traffic offences and the cases have not gone to appeal, or where fines have been paid over a period of months or weeks and have not yet been paid in full, will those large fines be reduced and will transitional payments be reduced? Thousands of people feel that they have had a raw deal. If the law is to be changed, the changes should be retrospective.

Will the Home Secretary explain how he can talk about bail in the light of what Asil Nadir did the other week when he flew the coop, some say with the help of the Government as he paid £440,000 to the Tory party—and he who pays the piper, calls the tune?

Mr. Clarke: On the hon. Gentleman's first question, large numbers of people are appealing against the fines imposed on them, and quite large numbers have been successful in getting the fines reduced. The Crown court is able to correct on appeal some of the stranger fines which have been imposed—that process will continue. It is up to the House to change the law in future and give the magistrates courts the full discretion they require. Not all the reported cases of high fines are as outrageous as they are sometimes made to appear, although some are absurd, as I have said.

However, some are a slip—it is not necessary to regard the £100 unit as essential when someone has not filled in the form. For example, in the notorious case of the man who was fined £1,200 for dropping a crisp packet, the fine was reduced to £48 on appeal to the Crown court. The fine might have been lower if someone had asked the man to fill out a form at the magistrates court before the first £1,200 fine was imposed.

There is a process under which people can appeal against sentences which they feel are wrong, and have them put right. Some of those who complain to the newspapers have committed serious offences, and I have read of some cases that made me surprised that those involved were not sent to prison rather than being given a large fine. Parliament approved raising the maximum fine to £5,000—a fine is a proper penalty for people with the means who have committed serious offences.

I do not believe that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is seriously maintaining that the Government supported Asil Nadir's escape. If he is, his accusation is groundless and ridiculous, and there is no shred of evidence to support it. His claim is about as daft as his hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield believing that spies are bugging royal marriages.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that my constituents will be delighted by the proposals that he has announced today, particularly as they have suffered as a result of people who have reoffended while on bail? Will it be made clear in the amendments that it is not only parents who are responsible for their children's behaviour, but county councils such as Lancashire county council, into whose care they have been committed? Does he not deplore the fact that the county council appealed against the damages levelled against it for offences committed and damage caused by the children who had been in its care?

Mr. Clarke: The Act applies to local authorities with children in their care as well as to parents, and I agree with my hon. Friend. Some local authority homes are the principal centres of car crime and burglary in their areas. I have some sympathy for those in charge of the homes, however. Following the Children Act 1989 and the guidance issued under it, a great deal of litigation has ensued in the name of children's advocacy; and it has been extremely confusing to be buffeted between the following competing demands—those living near the homes need to be protected from burglary; at the same time, there are the constant worries about the abuse of children and the use of excessive force.

I welcome the guidance recently issued by my colleague in the Department of Health which made it clear that the staff have the legal power—and, in my opinion, the duty—sometimes to impose restraint on young people in their care who are likely to do harm to themselves or others. I am sure that my hon. Friend is looking at that guidance in more detail to ensure that we eventually arrive at a commonsense balance that protects children from abuse by those in charge of them and also protects neighbours and local people from crimes committed by children who are completely out of control and who cannot be restrained when the police return them to the children's home from which they have come.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am always keen, as the House knows, to call as many hon. Members as possible, but the House makes that extremely difficult for me when Members ask long questions and make long comments. It is equally difficult when Ministers give very long answers. I hope that what I have said has been taken to heart by all concerned.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I welcome the Minister's intention to get rid of the unifying system which, in practice, has so often worked out unfairly. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell magistrates what they are to do in the meantime? Has he not advised magistrates to use their discretion? The Justices' Clerks Society has advised magistrates that, in its view, to do so would be unlawful. So what are magistrates to do until the system is changed?

Mr. Clarke: The Magistrates Association recently put out advice to its members shortly after it had held a meeting with me. I am glad to say that it was a productive meeting. We entirely agreed on what we wanted to restore to the courts. I believe that the guidance that the association put out thereafter was helpful and accurate.

I have not heard whether the Justices' Clerks Society is maintaining its opposition, but I think that it will find when it reads the guidance carefully that it is consistent with the Act.

One trouble is that practice has varied so widely from court to court. Sometimes courts have appeared to be acting in the belief that they have scarcely any discretion in the size of the unit or how they apply the system. A proper examination of the Act, even before we change it, will show that it does give magistrates courts much wider discretion than some of them have been led to believe in the early stages.

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): As my right hon. and learned Friend has said that he will consider other improvements while he is examining these questions, may I ask him to recognise that what worries many of us more than anything is the appalling slowness of the machinery of justice? While it may be necessary to consult the Lord Chancellor, can he give us an undertaking that he will look into that speedily; and that if more resources are required, in the name of British justice they must be provided?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. Incidentally, I was probably less than fair to the hon. Member for Sedgefield for not referring to what he said about how the courts are administered. I have considerable sympathy with his remarks.

The process of criminal litigation—of investigation and processing—now takes much longer than it did 10 or 20 years ago. That is partly inescapable, because of all the additional safeguards introduced to protect yet further the rights of the accused and to guard against the problems of unfair convictions. I am not satisfied, however, that the process is conducted as expeditiously as it could be. I am not satisfied that it imposes the minimum office-bound duties on police officers.

There are too many court adjournments, a problem with which my right hon. and noble Friend is dealing. There are also many other aspects of the administration of criminal justice to which we should turn our minds. Some of them are far beyond my control—for instance, the average length of a criminal trial is almost invariably longer than it was 20 years ago, with no noticeably dramatic improvement in the quality of justice.

I accept that we should not look at the subject in a piecemeal fashion. The criminal justice system faces unprecedented burdens and demands today, but we must ensure that it responds expeditiously while remaining just in its conclusions.

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Resulting from the Home Secretary's initial response to my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and the comments that the Home Secretary made on television yesterday—that in all probability private conversations between the Prince and Princess of Wales had been bugged—would the Home Secretary confirm that if such bugging took place it was an illegal act, and that a proper police inquiry and investigation should take place?

Mr. Clarke: I did not say that bugging had taken place. Among the many absurdities appearing in today's press is a misuse of what I said. I was being pressed, ad nauseam, by a lot of journalists—some from newspapers trying to justify yet more pages of royal gossip—about the marvellous bugging that they were so interested in. As they went on, I am afraid that I treated with derision the suggestion that they had the slightest evidence that the bugging had anything to do with the security services. I was told that they had all the information, so I said, "Well, it appears that someone's bugging the royal family."

I have no more knowledge than the hon. Gentleman of whether the stuff is authentic. Having seen some of the people who were parading around yesterday, arguing about who would get money out of it, I am not sure that I am satisfied that any of it is authentic. It is absolutely absurd for the House to be taking up such nonsense at the behest of tabloid newspapers, when the rest of us are discussing serious matters of criminal justice and the powers of the courts.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): My right hon. and learned Friend's statement will strike the people of my constituency—who have been writing to me in their hundreds—as according with the grain of common sense, which is exactly what they would expect from a Conservative Administration. They will also have noted the complete lack of support that the statement received from the Liberal Benches.

When my right hon. and learned Friend considers other measures in the same way, will he please consider the workings of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984? As a practising solicitor, may I inform him that any solicitor would tell him that the Act is wide open for exploitation in the interests of criminals? The problem with the operation of the Act is that the balance between the rights of the criminal and those of society has swung so far that the legislation is actively exploited in the interests of the criminal fraternity.

Mr. Clarke: I agree that common sense is one of the better qualities that can be brought to politics of all kinds. I am sorry that its application has finally sent the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), rushing away to the refuge that I recommended to him. He has gone to confer with his colleagues.

On the second question, the introduction of taped interviews and so forth seems a valuable advance in criminal investigations, and I would not willingly sweep away the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. However, we are waiting for the royal commission, which must deal with the right balance between the demands of justice, the proper requirements of the public interest, and proper and sensible safeguards for the rights of the accused.

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green): Does the Home Secretary agree that the allegations about the security service bugging the royal family seek only to undermine confidence in the service? Does he therefore think that it would be a good idea for the Government to approve the recommendation of the Select Committee on Home Affairs that there should be parliamentary scrutiny of MI5?

Mr. Clarke: The House should not dance that sort of tune to the events of the past few days. We should devote the time of the House, and the efforts of those whom the Government ask to carry out inquiries, to serious matters, where there is some sort of evidence to be investigated. No serious person has come up with any evidence from which one could begin to investigate the rather daft allegation that MI5 is bugging the royal family—[HON. MEMBERS: "There is."]. A mere suggestion in a favourite newspaper —it may not be your favourite, Madam Speaker—is not grounds for political debate or public inquiry.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): My right hon. and learned Friend's proposals will be widely welcomed on Teesside, which unfortunately is the second worst area for car theft. I am told by local police that about 150 young people are perpetrating about 90 per cent. of the crimes. If the courts take all their previous offences—which are legion—into account as a result of today's proposals, will that mean that we will have to put more young people in secure accommodation? If so, is he satisfied that the 17 or 18 places that he has announced for the region will be sufficient? If they are not, will he provide more?

Mr. Clarke: There are strong feelings in all parts of the north-east, and that includes my hon. Friend's constituency, about persistent car theft by a handful of young people. The changes that I am proposing will mean that, when dealing with an offender of any age, the court will be entitled to look at all the offences that he has committed and for which he is before the court, and not just at the most serious and one associated with it. The court will be empowered to have regard to what has happened previously when other types of sentence have been tried. There may well be an even bigger demand for secure accommodation than has already grown up under some of the better provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

There is nothing to stop local authorities providing secure accommodation now, so long as they comply with the requirements of the Children Act 1989. The policies of both the social services and local authorities have led largely to the dramatic decline of secure accommodation across the country, and many local authorities are still unwilling to extend any secure accommodation.

The Government make money available for small numbers of additional places, as my hon. Friend said, but we need to study the proposals made earlier this year about the secure training order and also look for other providers of secure accommodation apart from the social services departments if we are to meet the level of need in the north-east of England.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Why does not the Home Secretary take more seriously the allegations against the security service, bearing in mind the fact that previous allegations about the security service that were denied turned out to be true? Why does he not bear in mind that the feeling of many hon. Members, which I raised at the last Home Office Question Time, is that the Security Service should be fully accountable to Parliament, as in other western democracies? What is so wrong with that, and why does he dismiss it? The Opposition require no lectures on crime from the Government, bearing in mind what has happened in the past 14 years.

Mr. Clarke: The Security Service is subject to my supervision as Home Secretary, as it has been with succeeding Home Secretaries. It is also subject to supervision of the commissioner, Lord Justice Stuart Smith. The Master of the Rolls is also empowered to supervise the security services and has reported that he is quite satisfied—I do not use his exact words—that the Security Service has not been involved in those matters. So a High Court judge, who is the commissioner of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, can find no evidence of such involvement.

Some people are obsessive about anything to do with both the security services and with the royal family. I said yesterday, and I am sorry to repeat it, that if the hon. Gentleman asserted to me that the moon was made of green cheese—which he might—I would investigate it if he could produce anyone who had even seen that the moon was made of green cheese or had a crumb of cheese from the surface. However, the mere assertion in whatever newspaper the hon. Gentleman has read that MI5 is involved is not a basis for setting aside all the statutory controls that the House has agreed or for pandering to newspapers and to people trying to make a quick buck from nasty books.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): My right hon. and learned Friend's statement will, I am sure, help magistrates and courts to give priority in sentencing to the victims and not to the criminals. Therefore, will he confirm that it is not his intention in any way to interfere with those parts of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 that are working extremely well? They include stronger parental responsibility, tougher sentences for those who commit violent and sexual crimes, reform of parole and tougher community sentences.

Mr. Clarke: Those provisions are indeed all working well. They are quite essential, and I think that we have now sorted out the way in which those provisions are working and put them in line with what I believe the House intended. The Criminal Justice Act 1991 will be seen as yet another improvement to the criminal justice system, strengthening the hands of the police and the courts.

Business of the House

4.13 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 17 MAY—Until seven o'clock, private Members' motions.

Motion relating to the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 18 MAY—Motion for the spring Adjournment.

Remaining stages of the Foreign Compensation (Amendment) Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 19 MAY—Opposition day, 12th allotted day. Until about seven o'clock, there will be a debate described as "Automated Credit Transfer and the Threat to Sub-post Offices", followed by a debate described as "The Destruction of Britain's Defence Industrial Base". Both debates arise on Opposition motions.

THURSDAY 20 MAY—European Communities (Amendment) Bill, Third Reading.

FRIDAY 21 MAY—Debate on Government support for exporters, on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 24 MAY—Progress on the remaining stages of the Railways Bill.

The House will also wish to know that, on Wednesday 19 May, at 10.30 am, European Standing Committee A will meet to consider EC documents relating to the slaughter of animals, and European Standing Committee B to consider documents on the protection of young people at work.

[Wednesday 19 May:
European Standing Committee A
Relevant European Community Documents:
9880/91, 10306/92 } Slaughter of animals
Relevant Reports of the European Legislation Committee:
HC 24-x (1991-92), HC 79-xxiii (1992-93), HC 79-xvi (1992-93), HC 79-xxviii (1992-93), HC 79-xix (1992-93),

European Standing Committee B
Relevant European Community Documents:
5378/92, 4690/93 } Protection of young people at work
Relevant Reports of the European Legislation Committee:
HC 79-iii (1992-93), HC 79-xxvi (1992-93), HC 79-xxiv (1992-93), HC 79-xxviii (1992-93.]

Lastly, I hope that it will be for the convenience of the House to know that, subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the spring Adjournement on Thursday 27 May until Monday 7 June. In case anyone has forgotten what was announced provisionally, I point out that that means one day's extra holiday.

Mrs. Beckett: I feel sure that the House will wish to thank the Leader of the House for his statement. I had not forgotten what was originally announced, but it is useful to be reminded. Am I right in assuming that there will be no parliamentary questions on the Thursday on which the House rises for the Whitsun recess?

On a number of recent business question days the Leader of the House has been good enough to say that he is trying to keep up a record of accepting one of our proposals a week, so may I offer him this week two long-standing options from which to choose? First, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, we are seeking a debate in Government time on two Scottish issues, one of which is the important issue of water privatisation in Scotland, on which yet again fresh conflicting statements seem to be coming from the Scottish Office and elsewhere. As for the second Scottish issue, the right hon. Gentleman will be aware that we have sought a debate in Government time on the White Paper on what the Government call the stocktaking exercise concerning powers in Scotland.

My second range of options involves defence. Despite the fact that we are devoting half of our Supply day to defence, we are aware, as we feel the Government should be, that it is now two years since we debated the defence estimates. The Leader of the House will be aware that such a form of debate offers an opportunity for wide-ranging discussion, and I am sure he knows that it has been suggested that the Government have avoided scheduling a debate for such a long time because they feel some embarrassment at the criticisms that they may face, perhaps even from their own party. However, I know that the Leader of the House takes the view that it is not up to the Government to run away from parliamentary scrutiny of difficult issues and that, indeed, they should ensure that the opportunity is offered. Especially in the light of what has happened to Swan Hunter today as a result of some defence decisions, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will consider finding time for a debate.

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friends consider keeping the House informed by means of updating statements on the position in Bosnia?

Mr. Newton: I thank the right hon. Lady for the generally constructive spirit in which she again seems to approach her task, and for her kind comments about the constructive spirit in which she, rightly, thinks that I am approaching my task.

I shall take the right hon. Lady's questions in reverse order. I can certainly give her a general assurance that if it seemed right that a further statement should be made about significant developments concerning Bosnia, I should of course seek to arrange that.

I can assure the right hon. Lady that there is no question of the Government's seeking to avoid embarrassment on the defence estimates. The difficulty is that of fitting in the debate, but I shall certainly seek to do so, and we can continue to discuss the matter through the usual channels. The right hon. Lady's question was perhaps a little unkind in view of the fact that several days have been made available for discussing defence matters over the past month or two. If the anxiety was about embarrassment, I do not think that we would have scheduled those as we did.

The debates that the right hon. Lady seeks on Scottish matters, too, should be further discussed through the usual channels, although in the case of water privatisation it would seem to me to be more sensible for a debate to take place when the Government have reached and announced conclusions.

In response to the right hon. Lady's specific first question, I can confirm that it is not proposed to take questions on Thursday 27 May.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 1877 on fairer trade with the third world?

[That this House recognises that fair trade is as important as aid in tackling Third World poverty; notes that the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, which directly discriminates against poor countries' clothing and textile exports, denies poor people vital jobs; further notes that the EC has already agreed to start lifting quotas on clothing and textiles from East and Central Europe despite the failure to conclude a GATT agreement, while restrictions against the world's poorest countries have been extended once again; believes that the British Government, through its participation in the EC, the GATT negotiations and the G7 Summit in Tokyo this July, is well placed to take a lead in lifting trade barriers which discriminates against poor countries; and therefore urges Her Majesty's Government to press the EC to start the 10 year phase out of the Multi-Fibre Arrangement, bringing out the poorest countries first and fastest.]

Does he agree with me that, although it is entirely right that the House should be concerned about the crisis in the former Yugoslavia, many millions of our fellow human beings throughout the world are suffering poverty, malnutrition and starvation as a result, in large part, of the unfair trading patterns in the world? Will he find time for an early debate in the House on this matter?

Mr. Newton: While I cannot promise my hon. Friend the early debate that he wants, although I will certainly bear in mind his request, I can most certainly join with him in the general proposition that an open multilateral trading system is of great importance to what is called the third world. Indeed, it is for that very reason, among others, that we as a Government, and I think the whole House, place so much importance on a satisfactory conclusion to the GATT round.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): May we have a statement this week, or at the latest next week, on water privatisation which in England and Wales has led to about 50,000 homes being disconnected and 10,000 cases of dysentery? In view of the recent reports about a possible Government U-turn on Scottish water privatisation, may we have a clear and unequivocal statement at the earliest opportunity that Scottish water will remain in full public ownership, otherwise water privatisation will do for this Government what Watergate did for Nixon?

Mr. Newton: I cannot add to what I said, partly explicitly and partly by implication, to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett). All the options set out in the consultation paper called "Investing for Our Future" are being considered, and the appropriate time for debate, in my view, is when conclusions have been reached.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend find just a short slot to enable hon. Members to pay a tribute to our late hon. Friend Robert Adley? [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear.] He was my neighbour in the House and my near neighbour, and I frequently had the honour and pleasure of driving him to and from the House, particularly on days when he was far from well. He was one of the great characters of the House, a man of great courage, strength and determination. His wife Jane has been through it these past few weeks. I am sure that we would all like to send love to her and expressions of support to her family.

[Mr. Harry Greenway]

Mr. Newton: I am sure that you agree, Madam Speaker, that the response from both sides of the House to my hon. Friend's remarks shows that he is exactly right, and I feel that you too will wish to be associated with them. I certainly wish to be. I had a huge regard for Robert, and I believe that he will be missed on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Does the Leader of the House agree that, if sufficient members of the public in Denmark go along with the view of Her Majesty's Government that the Edinburgh decision makes no change whatsoever in their citizenship or national obligations, there may be need for a statement adjusting the business for a week today? Will he undertake that, if there is no acceptance of the question that is being posed to the Danes, that business will be changed?

Mr. Newton: I certainly do not anticipate that need, but obviously Her Majesty's Government always consider changes in circumstances as may be appropriate.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham): My right hon. Friend is no doubt aware of the great concern felt by several hon. Members at the delay in the Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill. There is a lot of interest among my constituents in Chesham and Amersham and also by the corporation in London, and increasing concern about the delay. I hope that, as the consultants' reports are with Ministers, my right hon. Friend will give an undertaking that the Bill will be brought before the House very soon.

Mr. Newton: I am certain that my hon. Friend is aware of some observations that I made on that matter last week. As she rightly says, the consultants' report has been received and my right hon. Friends are considering its conclusions. I am afraid that I cannot today, much as I would wish to have the chance to hear her, go beyond what I said last week.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): As the horrors of Bosnia continue unabated, may I press the Leader of the House to press the Prime Minister, as opposed to other Ministers, to make a statement early next week about what action the Government and the international community will take to end all aggression in Bosnia, to secure an effective ceasefire and to defend the so-called United Nations-protected areas?

Mr. Newton: It was within my hearing and, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman's that my right hon. Friend made some further observations—albeit briefly of the sort that are possible in Prime Minister's questions—only a few minutes ago. I should have thought that my right hon. Friend, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and others had made it amply clear over many weeks that they are concerned to do everything that they practicably, possibly and sensibly can to achieve the objectives that the hon. Gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Would it be possible for my right hon. Friend, in the interests of open government, either to arrange a debate or to publish the arrangements by which various Departments bid for time and legislation in the Queen's Speech? There appears to be an ethos, supported throughout the House, that careers are judged on the quantity of legislation that is pressed through the House. If I judge the mood of the country correctly, there is a feeling that there should be a lighter regime altogether.

Mr. Newton: Although that issue is not, as it were, constitutionally tied to my present capacity, my hon. Friend's question is directed to the right quarter as it is a matter of public knowledge that I am Chairman of the Committee, whose initials are FLG, that examines those matters. I hope that when the proposals finally see the light of day my hon. Friend will feel that we have had some regard to his strictures. On the other hand, one has only to be present in this House week by week to know of the number of vigorous demands for legislation in particular that come even from those who are against legislation in general.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Is it not time that we had a debate about the serious crises that are building up in the former communist states? Has the Leader of the House seen the statement by Mr. Dashiyn Byambashurian, who resigned from the Great Hural and from his position as Prime Minister of Mongolia because he feared that the country was returning to communism? The crises in that country—and in many others—of finance, of shortage of fuel and of famine are so serious that the population are moving away from their centrally-heated homes and going back to live in medieval yurts which were used thousands of years ago. Is it not true that Britain, by promoting well-intentioned reforms in the former communist countries, is in grave danger of re-creating the tyrannies that they are designed to destroy?

Mr. Newton: All of us, I am sure, are concerned about many of the stories that we read about some of the countries that have been undergoing political and economic change. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that we shall have a debate on that matter, and certainly not next week.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): On next Wednesday's business on sub-post offices, is my right hon. Friend aware that wild, false rumours are running riot about possible wholesale closures of sub-post offices and the interruption of benefits and pensions? Would my right hon. Friend put on his former social security hat to ensure that the Government have an immediate advertising campaign in newspapers and on television to put the record straight and to state that sub-post offices will remain open and that pensions will still be paid——

Madam Speaker: Order. It is a very good try, but the hon. Gentleman is really asking a substantive question on that matter, which is not now the responsibility or the duty of the Leader of the House. If he asks a question about next week's business, that is another matter.

Mr. Madel: I thought that what I said might help next week's business in relation to Wednesday——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is seeking an advertising campaign. What he should be seeking is a statement in next week's business. Is that possible?

Mr. Newton: I will draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security to my hon. Friend's request for him to make a particular point about the matter in the speech that he may have the opportunity to make next week. Apart from that, I draw my hon. Friend's attention to what I thought were the clear-cut remarks of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister an hour or so ago.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): Can the Leader of the House reveal when the Bill on the security services and Government Communications Headquarters will be published? Will he find time for an early debate on the scrutiny of those services because many of the talented people who work in them feel aggrieved that they are unable to answer the allegations contained in newspapers this week?

Mr. Newton: I note the point that the hon. Gentleman makes in the latter part of his question, but I cannot promise an early debate on that nor, for reasons that I am sure he will understand—not least because the Government's proposed programme of legislation for the next Session is currently under discussion—can I give him a precise date for the publication of a particular Bill.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Further to his answer to our hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), will my right hon. Friend convey to his ministerial colleagues the frustration and resentment of my constituents in Aylesbury and many thousands of other people in Buckinghamshire that the crossrail project is subject to so much delay and uncertainty? Will he give Ministers an early opportunity to say that this project has their approval and that they will press ahead with the Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill?

Mr. Newton: I note genuinely that this is the third time that one of my hon. Friends has raised this matter in the course of a fortnight. I am sure that it will also have been noted by my right hon. Friends who, I think rightly, wish to have a proper opportunity to consider the consultants' report. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be here to answer questions on Monday 24 May.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The Leader of the House mentioned the FLG Committee. He will be aware, therefore, of correspondence between the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster regarding the privatisation proposals for 8,000 jobs in the Scottish Office and a potential threat to up to 50,000 jobs. The letter shows that several Cabinet Ministers are acting in concert to avoid public scrutiny of legislation which they would need for specific functions regarding privatisation and that, instead, they intend to produce an omnibus Bill in the Queen's Speech in October.

Given that what we are witnessing by these covert actions is the possible loss of hundreds of thousands of civil service jobs and the demise of the United Kingdom civil service as we know it, will the Leader of the House consult his colleagues and ensure that there is an urgent and extensive debate on this issue next week?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake that there will be an urgent and extensive debate on this matter next week, but I take note of the hon. Gentleman's question and will bring it to the attention of my right hon. Friends.

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the successful introduction of the council tax? Is he aware that in my constituency half the people who have telephoned the council are asking why their bills are so low and that the only serious complaint has come from elderly single people living in large houses who, although they face a serious problem, are perhaps not quite aware how much they would suffer if the Opposition's policy were introduced?

May we also discuss the preposterous claim by the Opposition, repeated in two successive party political broadcasts, that the council tax is £14 lower in Labour councils than in Conservative councils? Is not the truth that it is a statistical fiddle and that, if like is compared with like, that is to say, properties of the same value, the true position is that the tax is £107 lower in Conservative councils?

Mr. Newton: On the latter point, it is clear that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who speaks for the Opposition on these matters, has been forced to acknowledge on a number of occasions that the comparisons that he has made are completely bogus, for exactly the reason that my hon. Friend has given.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): That is not true.

Mr. Newton: I have certainly not listened to everything that he has said, but I have read a good deal of it and that is the conclusion that I draw.

As to the first part of my hon. Friend's question, it is a considerable achievement of my right hon. and hon. Friends and also of local authorities throughout the country that the council tax has been introduced as smoothly as it has been.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): May I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1930 concerning May day?

[That this House appreciates the excellent weather that allowed the British people to celebrate and enjoy May Day on Monday 3rd May; and regrets the mean-spirited attempt by this Government to abolish this holiday, which is both a traditional British festival, and also celebrates the international solidarity of workers; and further deplores attampts to move the holiday into the cold, damp depths of autumn.]

Conservative Members have already commented on the effect that the abolition of the May day holiday could have on the hotel and leisure industry. Will the right hon. Gentleman prevail upon his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment to make a statement next week on the future of May day, and perhaps persuade her to take a positive attitude rather than her normal small-minded, petty, spiteful one of any institution associated with working people?

Mr. Newton: Having worked in a ministerial capacity for quite some time with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, when we were both in a previous incarnation, I did not recognise her from the descriptions and adjectives that the hon. Gentleman applied to her. An announcement on the question of May day will be made in due course.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): May we have a debate soon on the comments made earlier today in Baghdad by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) to the effect that he is not there to help in the release of the two British detainees? Is it not very worrying that Iraq is being seriously misled by the two unguided missiles that have been sent there?

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

Mr. Newton: I hope that my hon. Friend will understand why I hesitate before commenting on a statement reported from Baghdad which I have not had an opportunity to study. Certainly all of us would wish to see an effective effort made to resolve the problem that underlies my hon. Friend's question.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): May we debate again next week the issue of the enforcement of the days-at-sea restrictions on the fishing industry? Does the Leader of the House accept that one hour and 11 minutes on Tuesday night was neither the time nor the place in the agenda to deal with an issue as important as the days-at-sea restrictions? Does not the Leader of the House understand that the fishing representatives who attended the debate felt slighted by the truncated way in which the House dealt with an issue which affects the livelihoods of thousands of fishermen and their families in coastal communities around Britain?

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's remarks. There has been substantial debate on this matter in relation to the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992, which underlay the orders debated earlier this week. The fact is that those orders were debated in the normal way for negative orders. I think that that was proper. I noticed that the hon. Gentleman managed to make substantial remarks in the course of the debate.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): As the Prime Minister's answer about sub-post offices was substandard, is not it as well that we will have an Opposition debate on this subject next week? Why could we not have a debate in Government time as it is the Government's responsibility?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister having said what he said, I cannot quite understand the basis on which the hon. Gentleman makes that request. It is open to the Opposition to choose what they want to debate, and they have chosen that subject.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): May I endorse the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) for a debate on Scottish water, preferably prior to conclusions being reached?

May I push the Leader of the House on the Crossrail Bill and point out that if the Bill does not have a Second Reading in Government time very soon it will disappear? If the Government wish to kill the Bill, they should have the guts to do so; they should not allow it to go by default by not giving time for it to be debated. Many firms throughout the country will be given an economic kick-start if this and other major infrastructure projects are given the go-ahead.

Mr. Newton: I note that I now have a fourth Opposition Member to add to the growing list of Members pressing me on that matter. Nevertheless, I cannot be pushed, to use the hon. Gentleman's own word, any further this afternoon.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Given that environmental sustainability must henceforth be a fundamental principle in all economic policy, and given that Britain is a signatory to the Rio convention and committed to a sustainable development plan for Britain, will the Leader of the House ensure that we have a debate on this subject—which will be of far-reaching importance for economic policies—preferably before July, when I believe that the draft version of the plan will be published?

Mr. Newton: I can do no more, with the greatest good will, than note the hon. Gentleman's request. The Government acknowledge that environmental issues are of considerable importance, even though they can generate a lot of controversy. I will bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request.

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): Will the Leader of the House add another name to the list of those calling for an early Second Reading debate on the Crossrail Bill? Is he aware that the Government's central London rail study identified crossrail as the most beneficial transport infrastructure project for London and that the private and public sectors are eager to push ahead with the scheme?

Mr. Newton: I will add the hon. Gentleman's name to the growing list. I am less sure about his hon. Friend from Wales, who I thought might want the crossrail across Cardiff bay.

Job Losses

4.41 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It concerns the frustration that Welsh hon. Members feel about the constant repetition of the example of Shotton and the loss of jobs in the steelworks there 10 years ago, together with inaccurate employment figures that are given for Shotton. At first, the Secretary of State for Wales——

Madam Speaker: Order. I should be obliged if the hon. Member would come to the point of order for me and not argue his case.

Mr. Morgan: The frustration we feel is that parliamentary convention prevents us from saying that a lie has been perpetrated or that the House has been misled. The problem is that the same theme is being used by the Secretary of State for Wales. He first used it during the coal industry debate, when he said that the Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire coalfields did not have anything to worry about——

Madam Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Member please come to the point of order for me?

Mr. Morgan: I am concerned about the means available to Back Benchers to correct a totally incorrect impression that has been given. When jobs are lost in the shipbuilding industry in east Newcastle it is said, as the Prime Minister said today, that more jobs now exist in Shotton than existed when the steelworks were closed——

Madam Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Morgan: In fact, the number of jobs there now is only 45 per cent. of——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is a wily parliamentarian and I know full well that, in raising his point of order with me, he has his tongue in his cheek. I am not prepared to give him advice about procedure across the Floor of the House. He knows full well how to proceed in the matter. If he has a problem, he knows that I am always willing to have a chat with him in my office. My door is always open—most of the time, anyway.

Orders of the Day

Non-Domestic Rating (No. 2) Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment. Order for Third Reading read.

4.43 pm

The Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities (Mr. John Redwood): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am grateful to hon. Members for making such rapid progress in Committee with what is an excellent Bill. I am grateful to the Opposition parties, who have appreciated that the relief offered by the measure is greatly sought after by businesses throughout the country and will be welcomed by them.

As we discovered on Second Reading, the Bill offers a further freeze on rate bills for 1993-94 in real terms. It means that businesses are spared increases of 20 per cent. in real terms where they have a new rateable value of £15,000 or more in London or £10,000 or more elsewhere. Businesses with values below those thresholds are spared 15 per cent. increases.

It brings welcome relief to about 470,000 properties in England to the tune of £340 million in 1993-94 and £220 million in 1994-95, on top of the £1,250 million package that was announced and passed through both Houses last year.

The main beneficiaries will be businesses that have borne the brunt of increases following the 1990 revaluation, with the introduction of the unified business rate. It will include many shops and offices in towns and cities throughout the country, but especially in London and the south-east, where the valuation increases were largest in the valuation based on 1988 values, which turned out to be a high level in the market place. Those businesses can also look forward to the benefits of the new valuation orders on values in 1993, which will come into practice two years later, with parliamentary consent.

The costs of the changes and benefits to business will be met in full out of taxation by the Government making additions to the non-domestic rating pool. Businesses will not experience a change in liability to pay until the commencement date, which we would like to be three weeks after Royal Assent, so giving authorities time to adjust their bills. That is an important reason why I welcome the assistance of the House in making rapid progress with the measure, because it means that businesses are that much nearer to getting the relief that they seek.

The change in liability will have retrospective effect to 1 April, but in the meantime businesses should carry on paying the bills that they have been sent, until the House has completed all stages of the measure and the legislation is brought into effect.

The businesses, as I said, are particularly concentrated in London and the south-east, but there is welcome relief for businesses right across the country which were experiencing quite sharp increases in their valuations as a result of the latest valuation for business premises.

Of the 502,000 properties that will benefit from the measures, about 84,000 are in inner London, 44,000 in outer London, 128,000 in the rest of the south-east, 70,000 in the south-west, 30,000 in the eastern area, 31,000 in the east midlands, 25,000 in the west midlands, 39,000 in Yorkshire and Humberside, 35,000 in the north-west and 14,000 in the north of the country.

As the House can see, the measure has something for businesses all over the country which suffered from the revaluation and will be welcome to them as a result. I have pleasure in commending the Bill to the House and I again express my gratitude for its rapid passage.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): I am pleased to say that Opposition Members are continuing to support the Bill. Much was said on Second Reading by my hon. Friends about the need for the measure because of the way in which problems in the economy had made matters more difficult for businesses, particularly small businesses and especially in the south of the country, because they were faced with the largest increases in the business rate.

The need to refer to that on Second Reading was even more evident following visits I paid to areas in the south in recent weeks. I visited places such as Great Yarmouth, Norfolk, Ipswich, Suffolk, Hampshire and Weston-super-Mare. Unfortunately, I did not visit Buckinghamshire. Perhaps I should have done so. The difficulties faced by small businesses became more obvious to me and it was clear that they needed relief from the increases in business rates. The voters in those areas expressed that view firmly last week in the county council elections, where the Conservatives felt the impact in the most damaging way.

On Second Reading we had a thorough exchange of views about the need for the Bill, its content and some of the reservations that hon. Members on both sides had about it.

On Second Reading the House noted that the transitional arrangements for the business rate has applied for two years—for 1990-91 and 1991-92—and that during that period it had been recognised that a further transitional period would be needed to provide additional relief for businesses that had suffered most from the increase in the business rate, which occurred at the same time as the recession. Last year, therefore, the Opposition supported the further transitional arrangements that were made for 1992-93.

The House will have noted that the Opposition supported the transitional arrangements both on Second Reading and in Committee and that we are supporting them again on Third Reading. These arrangements are needed because of the depth and length of the recession. Even if there should be an economic recovery in the next 12 months, further legislation will probably be needed next year and the year after.

A number of worries were voiced on Second Reading and I shall voice them again today. We are worried that the Government will renege on any commitment to maintain, in real terms, expenditure on local authority services that they have identified may be needed in future. The worry is that the Government will be unable to provide local authorities with the resources that they currently receive, which many people believe are already inadequate. As business rate revenue next year is likely to fall, less money will be available to local authorities, which will lead to difficulties over local authority expenditure.

The Government are struggling to maintain the rate poundage at its present level, partly because of the effects of the recession and the transitional arrangements. Small businesses are worried that the Government may be tempted to renege on the 1988 regulations which kept the increase in rate poundage in line with the rate of inflation.

The transitional arrangements will eventually, of course, come to an end. If they were to come to a sudden end, the consequences for a number of businesses which now enjoy the benefit of this relief could be extremely serious. That worry is not addressed by the Bill. Therefore, the small business community is looking for an assurance that there will be no sudden end to the transitional relief scheme.

People are also becoming increasingly worried about the lack of local democracy. Local people are no longer able to make decisions that affect them; they are unable to determine the kind of services that they want for their community and the way in which those services should be financed. It is not only those who were campaigning in the local elections, or Opposition Members, who say that. Many business leaders are saying it, too, as well as the Institute of Directors and the chambers of commerce. They believe that the determination of the business rate should be left to local communities.

The Government should examine the possibility of giving that responsibility back to local communities. I can give the people of this country a commitment: that the Opposition, when in government, will address that important issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman says anything else, I remind him that Third Reading speeches are supposed to be about the contents of the Bill. He is going rather wider than the contents of the Bill.

Mr. Henderson: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not intend to steer myself away from the Bill's contents.

The business community believes that the effects of the Bill will be beneficial. I predict, though, that similar legislation will be needed next year. Additional legislation will also be needed to deal with the revaluation of business properties—effective from 1995, but based on rental values this year. Revaluation will give rise to a number of anomalies with which the House will have to deal at some future date.

Notwithstanding our reservations, some of which I have intentionally expressed and others to which I referred inadvertently, we are happy to give the Bill a Third Reading.

4.56 pm

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Unfortunately, I was not here for the Second Reading debate, though I read the report of it in Hansard. Nevertheless, I attended diligently throughout the Committee proceedings and enjoyed them enormously.

I support the contents of the Bill, largely because of the effect that it will have on my constituency, which has been hit hard by the recession. It is an area that has traditionally enjoyed high employment and a high level of business expansion. The shock of the recession had a disproportionate effect on businesses in my community. That is why the Bill is so welcome. Businesses in my constituency are committed to being among the first to come out of the recession.

Business needs a degree of certainty for its expansion plans. The Chancellor's announcement and the contents of the Bill will go a long way towards providing local businesses with the confidence to make an extra effort and thus reduce unemployment.

The Bill builds upon the provisions of the Local Government Finance Act 1988. Its importance is that it limits the rise in business rates to the level of inflation. I moved from an area where rateable values are traditionally low to one where they are traditionally high. I am only too well aware, therefore, of the effects that a move towards full valuation would have on local businesses.

Firms in Brentwood and Ongar need to be encouraged to take on more staff. I am acutely aware of the fact that 3,056 people in my constituency are unemployed. That figure is very small compared with unemployment elsewhere in the country. Nevertheless, it is my responsibility, and that of the House, to encourage local businesses to take on more people. The Bill will, I believe, encourage local firms to do precisely that.

I can foresee clearly what would happen if the Bill were not passed. In the past, business decisions were taken bearing in mind the effects of local taxation. The Bill ensures that business decisions can be taken which ignore the question of local taxation when considering the siting of an office or a factory. I recall a great disparity between offices in one part of the country and identical offices in other parts of the country. Under the old system, businesses were squeezed by local councils until—to use Lord Healey's immortal words—the pips squeaked. The system gave rise to unfair competition and unbalanced markets. Local firms were forced to look round the country for areas that had low levels of taxation. The Bill avoids that situation. It encourages business people to stay in their local communities.

Let me cite a classic case. I recall a firm that had a site in Kensington and Chelsea and a site in Sheffield. In one case the poundage was 117p and in the other it was 347p. That sort of situation does not encourage business people to stay in their local communities. I know of business men who literally took factory roofs off to avoid paying rates. That kind of activity does not encourage expansion. The Bill is necessary as it ensures that rate levels can be kept down. I have received from the chambers of commerce in Brentwood and Ongar representations to the effect that they are in favour of freezing the level of taxation.

I have much pleasure in recommending the Bill to the House and hope that hon. Members will feel able to support it.

5·1 pm

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): I too welcome the measures, which will provide some help for hard-pressed businesses. I am delighted to hear that 502,000 businesses throughout the country will benefit. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), whose remarks on Second Reading I read with amusement when I was in Cornwall to fulfil some long-standing engagements connected with the county council elections. It is clear from the results of last Thursday's elections that my visit was time well spent.

The only question mark over the Bill relates to whether it does enough. In the corresponding debate last year, the Minister said:

> "I know that the recession has created difficulties for many businesses . . . The Government have therefore decided that their costs this year should not be worsened . . .
> We propose a one-year freeze to provide a breathing space."—[Official Report, 19 May 1992; Vol. 208, c. 204.]

The fact that the Minister is now providing another year's breathing space shows that perhaps not enough was done last year.

Sadly, last year's green shoots of recovery faded away. The Government misjudged the situation then and the result was fatal for many thousands of businesses. This year there are signs that the number of businesses going under is beginning to decrease. I welcome that trend. Again we are hearing of the famous green shoots. During the election campaign someone told me that they were election green shoots. It is rather odd that these shoots always appear in the spring. I hope that this year's are real and that they will grow strong. Only when that happens shall we be able to get Britain back to work. Only then will hon Members be able to start to argue about where best to invest the new money, instead of scrapping about where cuts should be made.

With regard to recovery, the jury is still out. While I was travelling down to Cornwall two weeks ago I heard the financial director of Tarmac interviewed on the "Today" programme early in the morning. Having been asked whether there were any green shoots, he replied:

> "Yes, but we've seen green shoots every spring for the last four years, and they have all faded away."

On this occasion I am prepared to give the Minister the benefit of the doubt. Good luck to the green shoots and good luck to the many thousands of businesses all over the country which must survive and grow. I must put this question to the Minister: if, in the next few months, there is any sign that the recovery is faltering, will he come back to the House and announce further measures, including further non-domestic rate reductions, to help companies to survive?

5.5 pm

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to the hon. Members who have contributed to this brief debate.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) suggested that we shall need further legislation next year. I hope not. The signs of recovery are most encouraging. Business reports from around the country imply that output is rising and that there are opportunities for more business activity. That is what we all wish to see. I remind the House that this measure will continue to provide substantial benefits next year. Taking last year's provision and this year's provision together, the figure is about £355 million. We hope that that will be enough to do the job.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North asked about real levels of local authority expenditure and business rate pool compensation. As he is aware, this measure provides for full compensation to the pool for the expense of the concessions made. Details of real levels of local government expenditure for next year will be announced at the normal time and in the normal way. Statements regarding the public expenditure figures that we set out last autumn will give the hon. Gentleman some guidance about Government plans. As he will see there, we are not planning savage cuts in local authority expenditure, as he and some of his hon. Friends like to suggest. There is no intention to renege on the essential 1988 promise that, under the new system, business rates would be allowed to rise only at the rate of inflation. That was the kernel of the new scheme. That was the promise given to and widely welcomed by the business community. It remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and it is what the legislation says, with the necessary exception of revaluations—revaluations are always the exception—which have been handled through transitional relief and through this measure.

The hon. Gentleman is aware that transitional schemes have been set out for the most recent revaluation—that of 1988, which came into effect in 1990. I have told the House in the past—I renew the commitment—that, as we know the details of the new valuation based on 1993, and as we think about its introduction for 1995, we shall ask ourselves whether there is any need for a new or further scheme of transitional relief in the event of very large changes which we think would be difficult to implement in one go. I cannot say at the moment. I do not know, and I do not suppose that the hon. Gentleman knows, what changes might occur as a result of that revaluation. We will make our judgment at the time and will put the matter to the House in the usual debate.

I do not know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether you will allow me to wander into the area of local democracy, but I should like to say that the retail prices index pledge is important. I am not quite sure how the hon. Gentleman was marrying his wish to sustain the RPI link, which I entirely support, with his wish to give local councils discretion to fix the level of the rate. What discretion would they be given if the level of the permitted increase were specified in legislation? This is a matter that will need to be clarified in another debate or at another time.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) for his strong support for the measure. He has rightly said that small businesses are crucial in constituencies like his own. Indeed, they are crucial in constituencies up and down the country. It is small businesses above all that will welcome the measure. For a small business man faced with an increase in the valuation of single business premises, the cost increase is very big if the full impact of the change has to be taken. It is very likely that large national businesses with a variety of properties do rather better from the averages, or the swings and roundabouts, of the valuation system.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) criticised me for bringing to the House measures last year and then coming back for a second go in the current year. That is necessary, given the way in which transitional relief and the previous legislation worked. I would have hoped that his party would have welcomed the fact that in his Budget the Chancellor rightly saw that business would appreciate a further year's relief on top of the relief already granted.

Towards the end of his speech the hon. Gentleman was less cynical in his comments on recovery and green shoots. I welcome his desire to see recovery grow and strengthen, as we all do. I believe that the recovery is developing and that the measures will make an important contribution to improving business progress and prosperity over the ensuing year.

Therefore, I hope that we will not need to do the same next year, but I remind the House that the benefits of the legislation will live beyond the current year. That will be more than welcome to the business community.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

5.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I regret the need to stand at the Dispatch Box today to introduce a necessary Bill. Were it not for the survival of barbarism in the form of terrorist violence, there would not have been any need for such a Bill. It is a melancholy reflection on life in the latter part of the 20th century that there are still individuals who, in modern democratic societies, being unable to achieve their objectives through the democratic process of the ballot box, are prepared to throw aside the conventions of civilised society and to bomb, maim and kill indiscriminately. One consequence is damage to buildings as well.

The Bill is in response to the spate of terrorist bombings which have occurred recently and which are merely the British facet of an international problem. I was born just after one of the worst wars that the human race has ever suffered, after which we all thought that we would not see such barbarities committed again in Europe in our lifetime. Regrettably, I have grown up against a backdrop of political terrorism in Europe through groupings such as the Baader-Meinhof gang in the 1960s in Germany. On both sides of the House we all deplore and regret that feature of our lives. I am happy that there is a bipartisan or indeed a multipartisan consensus to the extent that we are all united in our desire and, indeed, our determination to prevent such acts of violence from having an impact on our political decisions in so far as those decisions might be thought in any way to involve the bowing of the head or the knee to the achievement of the political objectives of the terrorists who are responsible for so much damage and tragedy.

The Bill is a short enabling measure. I do not propose to speak for very long, but I shall describe the arrangements through which Government reinsurance for acts of terrorism will be provided. I shall also say something about a number of issues which I know concern some hon. Members. A summary of the arrangements was tabled on Tuesday 11 May in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington). I hope that that has been for the convenience of the House because, although I say so myself, I doubt that hon. Members will derive much profit simply from reading the text of the Bill. The meat which surrounds the skeleton is the way in which the reinsurance scheme has been constructed. That does not require us to deal with it in statutory form today.

Last November the insurance industry announced that, with effect from 1 January this year, it would cease to renew or to provide new insurance cover on industrial and commercial property which included provision for damage or loss caused by acts of terrorism. That withdrawal of cover was for prudent commercial reasons, following the loss of their own reinsurance protection predominantly from large European reinsurers, against the background of a sharp contraction in reinsurance capacity world wide and worsening claims experience in mainland Great Britain. It is a typical reaction of the international reinsurance market that during its cyclical reductions in capacity it not only increases prices but declines the least attractive business.

That development was understandably of great concern to British industry and commerce. We received many representations from individuals who were concerned at being unable to insure their property, which meant that they would have to assume the full measure of risk against damage from explosions caused by terrorists. In those circumstances, the Government could not stand idly by and we joined enthusiastically in discussions with the insurance industry and with those who at the end of the day have to pay the bills for the insurance that benefits them. We have put together a scheme which we believe will be effective and which will for ever deny terrorists of all kinds the fruits of their satanic endeavours to bring the country and its commerce to a standstill through explosions, wherever they take place.

The Government concluded that it was necessary to ensure the continued availability of insurance cover for loss and damage arising from acts of terrorism. That cover could continue to be available only if the insurers could be reinsured themselves. On 21 December 1992 the President of the Board of Trade, my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), announced that the Government would act as reinsurer of last resort to insurers of industrial and commercial property in Great Britain, with effect from 1 January this year. Since then, the arrangements necessary to give effect to the announcement have been developed to an advanced state. My right hon. Friend laid a minute before the House on 14 January explaining the reasons for entering into a contingent liability ahead of specific legislation.

A number of general principles underlie the Government's intervention. The Government seek to avoid disruption to industry and commerce which might be caused by lack of terrorism cover. The arrangements are to deal with the consequences of a market failure, but they are intended to minimise disruption of the insurance and reinsurance markets. The Government's involvement will last as long as is necessary to remedy that failure, but equally the arrangements are temporary and the Government will withdraw as soon as adequate sources of commercial reinsurance are available once more.

It is important to recognise that the arrangements are not a state aid. Over their lifetime, the arrangements are expected to be at nil cost to the taxpayer. The Government seek not to expose the insurers to undue risks which might threaten their solvency. Clearly, that would benefit no one and could cause a much wider collapse than would occur simply as a result of failure to insure or reinsure commercial and industrial property itself. If the solvency of insurance companies generally were adversely affected, the shock waves would go well beyong the centres of cities and would affect the whole country.

The arrangements are to cover the consequences of a market failure, but our aim is to maintain the insurance and reinsurance markets in effective operation and to fund the scheme ultimately from the premiums charged to those who derive the benefit of insurance and reinsurance for industrial and commercial property which is under threat of damage from terrorist explosions and the like.

The arrangements contain a number of necessary restrictions on the behaviour of the policy holder. Where such measures exist, they are the minimum consistent with the protection of the taxpayer who in a sense is the ultimate reinsurer. It is in the nature of commercial insurance that sophisticated policy holders will endeavour to be selective about the risks that they transfer to insurers, but the cardinal principle of insurance is the spreading of risk. In conditions of some market failure, risk needs to be widely spread if the interests of the taxpayer are to be protected.

I should make it clear that this is a reinsurance scheme, not compensation. If insurers do not buy the proper insurance cover, the Government will not entertain claims for compensation from them in the event of loss or damage. Although the Government have intervened, the solution that we have put together is fundamentally a market one.

The structure and operation of the arrangements are described in the summary tabled on 11 May, to which I referred a few moments ago. Briefly, insurers wishing to offer property insurance, including terrorism cover, will become members of a mutual reinsurance company, Pool Reinsurance Company Ltd. That company will reinsure all terrorism risks situated in Great Britain borne by its insurer members and for which an additional insurance premium has been paid by the insured. In turn, the Secretary of State will reinsure Pool Reinsurance Company Ltd.

The company will take an entirely commercial approach to applications for membership. In principle, all insurers operating in the United Kingdom will be eligible for membership, including Lloyds syndicates and overseas insurers. Conversely, membership will not be compulsory if insurers do not wish to join. An important feature for smaller firms is that their basic property damage policy will provide £100,000 of cover for buildings, contents and business interruption automatically and without the need to pay an additional premium. The insured will have the choice of buying extra terrorism cover beyond the £100,000 per section as an addition to their property insurance policy for which an additional premium will be paid.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Can my hon. Friend clarify what he means by membership? He said that membership will not be compulsory but voluntary. Is he referring to membership of the company in a technical sense? Who will be the shareholders, and will they be fixed?

Mr. Hamilton: The shareholders of the company will be those insurance companies that are reinsuring through the company. Consequently, membership of the company—as with any company—will be fluid over time as it will be a company limited by guarantee.

The aim of this scheme is for the Government to stand behind the insurance industry that wishes to provide the service of insurance cover for terrorism risks to ordinary members of the public who would otherwise be without the opportunity to take advantage of that service. I shall say a little more about the structure of the company in a moment.

As I said, the insured will have to pay for extra terrorism cover beyond the £100,000 per section. Consequently, we shall reinforce the market, rather than destroy it. That is why our ultimate aim—if that proves possible—is to withdraw again so that there is a reinsurance market capable of taking up the reins without the need for any Government assistance. Ultimately, we hope that all terrorist groups will draw a conclusion from a quarter of century of failure, in the case of the IRA, to move the British Government an inch towards the realisation of their objectives. I hope that the Bill will receive a warm welcome in such terms that anyone who might seek to change the political system in the United Kingdom by the bomb and the bullet will not derive any superficial advantage.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): The key to the success of the scheme relates to how soon the Government wish to withdraw from it. If the Government want an early withdrawal, higher premiums may have to be paid to get the money back.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend perhaps misunderstands what I am saying. We do not seek to be involved permanently in the scheme, but I must make it absolutely clear that the Government will stand behind insurance companies for as long as is necessary. We shall not in any way be deflected from the achievement of the purposes which lie behind the Bill by considerations of cost. Clearly, the cost to the taxpayer of the collapse of the commercial economic system of the United Kingdom, without having some mechanism of this sort to preserve stability, would be incalculably greater than whatever sums might have to flow from the taxpayer in the short term to iron out the fluctuations in income and expenditure of Pool Reinsurance Company.

Although we have tried to construct a scheme whereby there is a commercial involvement of the companies that provide insurance cover and of the Government—in certain circumstances we intend to charge a premium for the service that we provide—we hope that, ultimately, there will be no cost to the taxpayer and that the cost to the industry and, indeed, the insured will be a small portion of the total outgoings. The spreading of the risk as widely as possible, as we envisage through the scheme, will mean that a large number of individuals who are paying into the scheme will have to pay a sum which, admittedly, will be more than they have paid in the past. In the past, terrorist cover was thrown in with a policy at no extra charge and no one had to consider the matter because we were never subjected to significant risks.

It is inevitable that costs will be greater than they have been because the cost in the past has been zero to the insured. We hope and expect that such costs will be modest and easily absorbed, especially—to follow the points made by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities in the previous debate—as the economy is beginning to recover and the gross national product will rise with it. That will tend to more than offset any increased costs from the insurance sector. I do not wish to turn this debate in any way into a cause of controversy, so I will not pursue those dangerous lines of argument any further.

To return to the points that I was making earlier about the nature of the scheme that Pool Reinsurance Company will operate and the membership of the company, the insurer will be required as a condition of membership to remit all additional premiums to the company, which will hold and invest those premiums. The company will be reinsured by the Government, who will charge a premium —payment of which will be deferred until such time as the company has built up a stabilising fund of £1 billion. The premium charged by the Government as reinsurer will normally be 10 per cent. of premiums received by the company, unless what I might call an experience premium equivalent to the claims paid by the Government is greater. The deferred premiums charged on either basis will bear interest until they are paid.

When there are claims, the insurers will bear the first £100,000 under each section of the basic property policy and recover claims beyond that amount from the company. Such claims will be paid out of the premiums received. If those resources are exhausted, the company will raise a levy on its members of up to an equivalent of 10 per cent. of the premiums that they have remitted. If the levy and any investment income is also fully used, the company will claim on its reinsurance contract with the Government. The scheme is simple and can be broken down into segments of insurance, reinsurance and retrocession of the insurance agreement.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): My right hon. Friend and other hon. Members will know of my interest in this matter as a member of the council of Lloyd's and an underwriting member of Lloyd's of London. My right hon. Friend explained that the scheme is simple. He has made it clear that the scheme will not apply to Northern Ireland, where there is a different scheme. Can he explain why it is appropriate that there should be a separate scheme for the United Kingdom other than Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hamilton: I shall certainly do that. An interesting fact that I discovered about the situation in Northern Ireland as a result of background work for the Bill is that compensation arrangements have existed there for 300 years to cover the loss and damage caused by what might be called terrorist activity. We did not think it sensible to apply the same kind of scheme in Great Britain, which differs from Northern Ireland in many respects. It is a matter of horses for courses. The Northern Ireland compensation arrangements have worked very well during the current emergency, but we foresee no circumstances in which we would need such a scheme in the rest of the United Kingdom.

The extent to which we shall need to draw on the arrangements laid down in the Bill remains to be seen. We naturally hope that the terrorists will draw the logical inference from our readiness to act and will give up the struggle. I suppose that it is rather too much to expect psychopaths to think in a logical way, but they should be in no doubt that we will not allow the country to grind to a halt as a result of their activities in the city centres or anywhere else.

We shall react accordingly in any circumstances which may arise in the future, but for the time being we think that the scheme for which we now seek statutory authority will be effective in meeting the challenge presented to us in Great Britain. As I have said, we have designed a separate scheme to meet the different circumstances in Northern Ireland, although those circumstances arise from the same cause. Let me add that Northern Ireland will never be detached from the United Kingdom without a democratic vote by the majority there, freely given. The bomb and the bullet will never achieve that objective, certainly so long as the present Government remain in office, and I am sure that I also speak for the Labour party—should it ever be favoured with the opportunity to govern this country again—when I say that this bipartisan policy will be maintained.

If the Pool Reinsurance Company achieves an underwriting surplus in any year, after deducting the Government premium due for that year, it can distribute 10 per cent. of that surplus to its members in proportion to the premiums that they have remitted.

Clause 1(1) of the Bill empowers the Secretary of State to make payments in fulfilment of the obligations into which he has entered under the agreement to provide reinsurance cover. The clause also empowers the Secretary of State to make payments under guarantees that he may give. It is envisaged that he might wish to give guarantees to lenders, to ensure that the Pool Reinsurance Company could make prompt payment of claims from its members. Entering into the agreement and any guarantees would be subject to Treasury approval.

Clause 1(2) requires the agreement with the Pool Reinsurance Company to be laid before the House after the passing of the Bill, and as soon as it is entered into. Clause 1(3) requires Government premiums from the company to be remitted to the Consolidated Fund. Clause 2(1) defines the reinsurance arrangements to which the Act would apply: they involve risks of damage to property in Great Britain arising from acts of terrorism. Clause 2(2) defines the acts of terrorism concerned, and clause 3 provides that the Act does not extend to Northern Ireland —where, as I have explained, separate arrangements operate.

I want now to comment on a number of matters which have aroused concern in some quarters. Buyers of insurance are naturally anxious to minimise costs. The premium increases appear large in some cases as a proportional increase over the premium charged last year. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva), however, insurance premiums will still represent a very small proportion of total business costs and will represent good value overall.

Some illustrative examples may be helpful to the House. First, I take the example of a city centre office block insured for £10 million. The extra terrorism premium is typically £8,000 per year, up to a maximum of £12,000. Away from city centres, that would fall to £1,600 per year. By contrast, a typical annual maintenance charge would be £165,000 and the rent on such a block would be up to £2 million a year. In other words, the terrorism premium is equivalent to less than two days' rent.

The logic of that, for those who seek to bring the country to a halt by means of terrorist action, is that although those extra costs are unwelcome and an irritant —at a time of recession any extra cost is unwelcome and could have undesirable effects on employment, disrupt business, and so on—their chances of achieving their objectives in any meaningful way by means of explosions and damage to commercial buildings are so small as to be almost infinitesimal.

Equivalent figures for a £100 million block are a terrorism premium of £50,000, rising possibly to £75,000. On such a block there will typically be a maintenance charge of £1·3 million and an annual rental of up to £19 million. So the extra premiums that I mentioned, even in cases of that kind, are quite modest compared with other costs.

Work has also been undertaken to gauge the point at which increases in insurance premiums would distort location decisions. It is certainly not the Government's wish to make insurance premiums themselves a cause of businesses moving from one location to another. On the other hand, premiums will also need to follow the normal insurance principle of being related to perceived levels of risk. Premium rates are being reviewed now, and will be reviewed thereafter at least annually. In the present circumstances, the next price movement is almost certain to be upwards, but I would expect the price structure to evolve over time and prices to go down as well as up. Commercial buyers of insurance should bear in mind that —as I believe some already recognise—their premiums were about to rise sharply in any event, following a period in the insurance cycle when many insurers were losing money heavily on commercial lines.

The arrangements envisaged have a number of other advantages. By charging a premium for the reinsurance cover, the Government are both protecting the taxpayer and enabling the business community to carry on as usual despite terrorism. If no premium were charged, the arrangements would be permanent, as no commercial reinsurer could ever compete with reinsurance that was provided free of charge. The arrangements will create headroom which will allow commercial reinsurers to re-enter the market and, over time, allow the Government to withdraw. That is fundamental to our conception of the scheme. By deferring the paying of the premium until a sizeable fund has built up, the price should eventually settle at a lower and more stable level than would be the case if no buffer were ever created.

Furthermore, adapting an insurance solution to what is essentially an insurance problem means that the expertise of the insurance industry can be harnessed in settling claims speedily and fairly both for claimants and for those who bear the costs. If we were to introduce a compensation scheme, there could be greater delays and more inconvenience to those who, following damage and loss, want to get back to business as quickly as possible. In general, the market is likely to be more responsive than Government to spasmodic convulsions of that kind.

A number of groups have come forward seeking relief from the premiums being charged. I know that that worries many hon. Members. Of course, it would be nice to be popular with them by telling the Pool Reinsurance Company to accede to those requests as they arise and to let the taxpayer foot the bill but, as my hon. Friends know, it is no business of the Government to seek to be popular. Consequently, we have designed a scheme which may constitute a hard road, but which we believe in the long-term to be in the best interests of the entire country.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): My hon. Friend advances his argument extremely well. There is a cost that should reasonably fall on commerce and business—as my hon. Friend knows, I have advanced that argument forcefully in recent days—but does my hon. Friend agree that it is also crucial that all businesses should take advantage of the pool reipsurance facility and that the premium charged should not be a disincentive for them to do so?

Mr. Hamilton: I entirely agree with the second of my hon. Friend's two points. The premium charged should not be a disincentive against taking advantage of the scheme placed before potential insurers. Naturally, I hope that all people who feel themselves to be at risk from such damage or loss will take advantage of the insurance opportunity that exists. It is not the Government's intention to force people to take out insurance. If they choose to assume the risk themselves, that is a commercial decision that they must take.

I shall risk saying that it would certainly be in someone's commercial interests normally to take out such insurance. I am a great believer in insurance, but everyone has to make his own calculations. Clearly, companies expose themselves to significant risk in the event of an explosion. If the premium is modest, it should not prove a disincentive—it would be in people's interests to take advantage of the insurance.

We could make ourselves popular by acceding to the requests that have been made and let the taxpayer foot the bill. The logic of such an approach is that there is such upward pressure on public expenditure for the indefinite future that the same individuals, in their capacity as taxpayers, might find different reasons to place us in an unpopular light at times of greater political sensitivity—for example, when our seats are up for election at the next general election, whenever that may be.

I do not think that there is an easy answer to the problem. Apart from the implications for public expenditure, there is the question of how the insurers can explain special treatment for one group of policy holders to the remainder of their policy holders. There will also be the increased cost of operating a more complex scheme —success for one group is likely to encourage others, which could lead to a further erosion of premium income and the need for more premium increases for those taking advantage of the service. Such narrowness of scope runs counter to the insurance concept of spreading the risk and would also lead to problems of definition and qualification. As Minister with responsibility for deregulation, when designing the scheme I sought to reduce the amount of bureaucratic obfuscation and the cost of administration, and to make the scheme as simple as possible, as widely available as possible and as cheap as possible.

There has been only one amendment to the price tariff since it was introduced—to deal with the problem of blocks of flats. The insurers' original intention was to exclude private policy holders from the scope of their exclusion so that they would continue to receive terrorism cover for no extra charge. Although flat dwellers normally regard themselves as private policy holders, blocks of flats are commonly insured by service companies and property-owning companies, and thus treated as commercial customers. Individual private residents were therefore having an extra terrorism premium passed on to them. After further consideration of the costs and risks, the Pool Reinsurance Company reduced the premiums charged for blocks of flats and the move was announced in a written reply by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on 4 March. Blocks of flats with a sum insured value of up to £2·5 millions will be covered by the insurer for no extra premium. Above that level, the premium has been reduced to about one ninth of the rate for industrial and commercial premises in London and one quarter of the rate elsewhere, so no individual policy holder should face a premium increase of more than £10 to £20 for the normal range of property values.

I should like to clear up some confusion about the availability of cover for churches, which are eligible to be covered by the arrangements. It is for the individual church authorities to decide whether to cover specific churches by paying an additional terrorism premium. It so happens that the chief executive of one of the insurers specialising in covering church property is a member of the board of the Pool Reinsurance Company. Therefore, special arrangements were made some time ago to permit another specialist insurer of churches to remit its premiums to the Pool Reinsurance Company.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): The Minister is explaining the distinction between the insurance of commercial operations and the insurance of private operations. What would be the position of those taxi drivers who lost their vehicles through terrorist operations at the time of the Bishopsgate bomb? Are they classified as commercial operators and thus covered by the scheme, or as private ones? I believe that, at the time, they were classified as private and thus not covered by insurance. To take the argument one stage further, what about the private citizen whose car is commandeered in that way? Will he be covered by the scheme?

Mr. Hamilton: The Bill seeks to deal with the problem of insurance cover not being available in the market for damage to commercial buildings. It has never been the case that cover for terrorist risks was not available when cars were damaged—as in the case referred to by the hon. Gentleman. It is not the Government's purpose to prevent the market from providing a solution. If it were proved that such cover was not available, we would be prepared to consider representations on the subject. However, I understand that at present such insurance cover is available and that no one has been refused it. As insurance premium rates have been rising for a variety of reasons, which will be known to the hon. Gentleman, larger amounts of money may be involved. However, the insurance business is a competitive one—a large number of companies provide a variety of products and it should be perfectly possible for individuals who feel that they are at risk to obtain insurance protection against that risk.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): Minicab drivers can obtain either comprehensive or third party insurance for their cabs. Drivers with third party insurance are unable to claim compensation from the insurance companies in such cases because third party insurance relates to someone other than the insured. Later in the debate I hope to raise cases which have occurred recently in my constituency. Will the Government consider examining such cases, which involve people's livelihoods?

Mr. Hamilton: The short answer to the hon. Gentleman is that the drivers should buy comprehensive insurance and they would then be covered. It is up to each individual to decide for himself the level of insurance cover that he wants and to bear in mind the risks that he runs by not taking out cover. We all have to take such decisions. I have one car that is insured comprehensively and another car that is covered under third party, fire and theft insurance. I have taken that decision bearing in mind the car's value and whether I would seek to replace it if it were damaged as a result of an accident for which I was responsible. It is up to each individual to determine his requirements.

I hope that I have answered the question posed by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), whose presence today I welcome. Although the Bill relates to Great Britain, the hon. Gentleman's presence turns this into a United Kingdom debate. I always welcome the presence of Northern Ireland Members in debates in the House as it serves as a practical expression of this country's unity. That, in itself, is an act of defiance against the IRA and others who seek to detach the Province from the United Kingdom by their undemocratic methods.

I believe that the Bill and the scheme that we have developed represent a clear and unmistakable signal both to business and to terrorists of all persuasions. To business in London and throughout the country, the Bill is a signal that the Government are determined to ensure that the normal insurance mechanism will continue to work, so that business assets destroyed or damaged for whatever reason can be reconstructed or replaced without delay. To overseas investors in the United Kingdom I say the same. To the terrorists, it is a signal that business and Government together will not permit wanton criminal damage, whatever its cause, to interfere with normal commercial life for a moment longer than is necessary.

I have pleasure in commending the Bill to the House.

5.49 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I shall pick up where the Minister left off. We fully agree that terrorism cannot impose its will on the British people by acts of violence against property or person. The great tragedy of recent disasters has been the loss of life, for which we grieve and which creates widows or orphans, not a political solution. Unfortunately, that message has not penetrated elsewhere; but one message that can penetrate is that the people of the United Kingdom will not bend the knee or bow the head to terrorism in any guise. The problems of the people of Northern Ireland are, like all other problems, subject to a political solution which, as the Minister said, can come only by the ballot box and by majority vote. We are entirely in agreement with the Government on that.

The Bill must be seen in the context of how insurance markets are coming to terms with many of the disasters that struck at the end of the past decade and which affected the so-called London catastrophe market—to which reinsurers refer as the non-proportional excess of loss market. It has suffered a dramatic shrinkage of capacity —a shrinkage to which the President of the Board of Trade referred when he made his original statement on the Government being the reinsurer of last resort.

This dramatic shrinkage has also affected premium rates. The shrinkage resulted from a series of catastrophes which, with our short memories, we may already have forgotten: the Piper Alpha oil rig explosion of July 1988; hurricane Hugo; the Philips Pasadena refinery explosion; and the San Francisco earthquake. They all had an impact on the reinsurance market and showed how we live in and are part of a global market. They also had an effect on the retrocession market, as it came to be called, and they combined with the losses suffered by Lloyd's of London.

Before 1987, an insured loss of about $1 billion occurred only once every few years; now it occurs each year. The reinsurance market reacted to the events which brought about the general shortage of capacity and led to some reinsurers withdrawing from the scheme at the end of last year.

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

I welcome the fact that the Bill is retrospective as far back as 1 January and thus covers the niche left in the market by the withdrawal of those reinsurers. I also echo the Government's hope that, as a result of the mechanisms put in place by the Bill, some confidence will be restored to the reinsurance market. European reinsurers must understand that it is for them to come back into this type of risk, thereby, at first, providing competition for the Government and in the end allowing the Government to withdraw.

I agree with the idea that the Bill is a mechanism designed to help the reinsurance markets of the world, which should be big and confident enough to return to this sector.

On a lighter note, I was struck by the use of the word "retrocessionaire" as a description of the Government's role as a reinsurer of the last resort. I had hoped that hon. Members, having read "The House Magazine"—this week's issue contains an article by me on France—would come flooding into this debate from the bars and corridors of the House. I see the Government Whip shaking his head —he is probably right. Still, the idea of pro and anti-Maastrichteers and marketeers, of Europhobes and Europhiles, coming to the Chamber to debate "retrocessionaire" tickled my fancy.

As for the debate on Maastricht next week, I should like to be here in person to abstain—but I will not be. [Interruption.] I am told that an abstention is the same as a vote one way or the other. The Bill lays down no geographical restrictions on the location of the head office of an applicant, which means that membership of Pool Reinsurance will be open to continental Europeans as well as offshore Europeans.

It pleases the Opposition that the Government are indulging in some intervention. We remain an interventionist party, so when we see the Government intervening we are moderately gratified and encouraged. Often enough, we have sat here and seen the Government, like Pontius Pilate, wash their hands. Sometimes they have wrung their hands like Scrooge; but on this occasion they have taken a firm grip on the problem. They have taken action and in that they have our full support.

The Minister rightly balanced the mechanisms needed in respect of the margin requirements. In the past three or four years, the insurance companies have faced difficulties in this area because of the massive claims made against them. The Minister did not, however, mention article 85 of the treaty of Rome, relating to competition. He may have seen comments in the press to the effect that the Bill may have implications for EC competition law.

The Minister will know that when a number of competing insurance undertakings enter into an agreement under which they will provide cover only through an agreed mechanism, and when this mechanism enables them to defend uniformly higher premiums in such a way as to minimise risk to themselves and to decrease cover for the insured, that arrangement may fall within the scope of article 85.

It can be argued that the Government have laid down what premiums Pool Reinsurance should collect from the insurers. Once the premiums have been set, however, companies may be minimising the risk to themselves and that may give rise to matters that the DTI will have to work out with the Commission. My view is that, as the reinsurance cover is not available at the moment, this measure acts to increase cover. There are thus difficulties ahead for the Government with the European Commission. As Harry Truman said, perhaps the buck stops here, with the DTI. In this case, I prefer the words of Dean Inge, who once said that, although he had had a great many problems, most of them had never happened. I hope that the same will apply to article 85.

I am convinced that the Commission will not want to intervene to prevent the Bill from being fully operative or to prevent the gap in the reinsurance market from being closed. There is another difficulty for the Government, who are setting the premiums for the insurance companies through Pool Reinsurance. The hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva), who has left the Chamber, asked the Minister about that. [Interruption.] I am sorry. For those who read Hansard assiduously, let me make it clear that the hon. Gentleman is still in the Chamber. He asked the Minister about the impact of premiums. The danger for the Government would be if they set the premiums so high that the pool did not grow sufficiently to fulfil the purpose for which it was created. However, if the Government set premiums high, that would encourage competition from other reinsurers and bring them back into the market place.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman said that the Bill was retrospective to 1 January. That is my understanding, but I can see no reference anywhere in the Bill to 1 January, or indeed to any commencement date. In those circumstances, my understanding is that the Bill commences when it receives Royal Assent and not before.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing that to my attention. However, all the guidelines that I have received from the Department of Trade and Industry say that the Government's intention is that the Bill, when enacted, should be retrospective to 1 January. That will cover the niche in the market place caused when the reinsurers withdrew their cover at the end of last year. That is my understanding and I hope that the Minister will confirm it.

As far as I can tell from the Bill, the Minister has eschewed a policy of a compulsory levy on companies in designated areas. Having listened to the Minister with care, I would subscribe to that view. It is a matter for those involved to take out insurance as and when they wish, and how they wish. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) is in the Chamber. No doubt he will elaborate on that from the point of view of his constituents if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is right and proper that the Government should not, through their ultimate reinsurance cover, pick up the tab for looting, about which we have read a great deal in the newspapers. The Labour party has always believed, and still believes, in value for money. We have no intention of disbursing taxpayers' money gratuitously or abundantly in such a situation. What is remarkable is the number of people who come forward with a claim on insurance, and certainly on Government insurance, if they feel that they can. However, compensation for looting should be covered by general insurance policies. I am sure that, if those involved were to make a proper claim to their insurance companies, they would find that that was the case.

The Bill covers both damaged property and consequential losses arising from the interruption of business, so is not limited simply to the former. I agree with the Government on the point raised in the other place on 15 February this year, through a written question at column 62. The question was whether that cover would include premises closed as a result of the threat of terrorism.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): I seek clarification—perhaps from the hon. Gentleman, perhaps from the Minister—about compensation for looting. Looting is a risk that is not due to terrorism. If the building were left open, a claim for compensation for looting might be subject to question. If it were left open as a result of terrorist action, might not terrorist action be joined to the insurer's defence when resisting any such claim? There may be more complications here than meet the eye.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I had anticipated that point. One of the great things about speaking from the Dispatch Box is that one can sometimes anticipate interventions. The answer is that, in law, the claim would lie against the security firm rather than the insurance company. Victims of looting can make claims, but compensation does not necessarily lie through the route of the insurance policy.

I agree with the Government's view about the vacating of premises under threat, as expressed in the other place. They are also right to have the insured deal only with the insurers and to keep themselves at arm's length. That is sensible.

The scheme has the merit of keeping the Government's commitment to the minimum required by reinsurance. It places the burdens upon the insurance companies, when working out policies for commercial and industrial companies, and enables them to add on to the premium cover specific loss arising out of terrorist action. The Minister was right to say that that has been part of general insurance policies in the past. It will now be an add-on —to use a computing term—and provide for an additional 10 per cent. from insurance companies that are members of Pool Re and also for the realisation of investment income before there is a charge on the Exchequer.

The balance of the scheme is such that it should encourage other reinsurers to come into the field. It permits the insurance world to show the flexibility that is required in a fast-moving world with a fast-moving insurance market. It also gives the insurance world an opportunity to assist those in the community. One of the themes that the Opposition are developing is the role of insurance companies within the framework of the community. Rather than withdrawing from the community by withdrawing cover for such claims, the insurance world will come back into the community, with the Government as last-resort insurers. That means that business will be as usual in the complex world in which we live.

I would not wish to bore the House too much with technical detail, but I noticed the convoluted manner in which the total premium to be paid to the Government as the reinsurer of last resort will be calculated. It is a relief that the Government would not normally be entitled to require Pool Re to make premium payments unless the surplus in Pool Re exceeds £1,000 million, and that the sum paid at any time will be limited so that the surplus remaining in the fund will not be reduced to below £1,000 million.

I have seen a number of pessimistic forecasts in the press as to how much premium income the pool is likely to attract, but I am confident that the framework and the guidelines of the scheme will rectify a weakness that has developed in the reinsurance market, caused, as I have said, by a shortfall in capacity. This modest Bill involves the Treasury in modest terms and will show our determination that it will be business as usual for the City of London, as it will be elsewhere.

I shall end my remarks where I began. The Minister said that there is an infinitesimal likelihood that terrorist attacks will succeed. The Opposition say that there is a non-existent prospect that they will succeed. The message we give to the terrorists is the message with which we began—death and destruction may follow from their actions, but political decisions will not.

6.8 pm

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), and to support what he has said. It is a particular pleasure that the House should be attended by hon. Members from all the component parts of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland, Scotland, England and Wales. It is also a pleasure that the House is in whole-hearted agreement on the necessity for the measure, for the reasons given so eloquently by the hon. Gentleman.

The Bill is, in one sense, interventionist, but it comes from a Government who are pragmatic in the way that they administer the governance of the United Kingdom. The principal reason for the Bill is to underline our determination that illegal acts of terrorism shall not be the means by which political changes occur. It is important that the House is united in that endeavour, since that will lead inevitably to the defeat of terrorism in the United Kingdom.

I am also glad to welcome the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister and to comment upon some of its aspects. First, however, I shall refer to the report of the commissioner of police for the City of London, published a few days ago, which makes it clear that, despite the incidence of terrorist attacks in the City—St. Mary Axe in 1992 and, sadly, more recently the Bishopsgate bomb—the fact of the matter is that the City of London police force has achieved what few police forces in the United Kingdom have so far achieved, in that its overall recorded crime figures show a decrease of 10·6 per cent., which, as the report says,

"is very much against the national trend and a greater decrease than any other Force in the country, many of which are in fact showing an increase."

The report says that the City of London, despite those isolated and horrific bomb incidents,

"is still a relatively safe and civilised area in which to live, visit or do business. It is important to keep that perspective as, given the hundreds of thousands of people who frequent the City daily, the statistical chance of being harmed by criminal or terrorist activity is still extremely low."

We should bear that point in mind.

I take this opportunity to commend the City of London police, a small but special police force that has rendered exceptional service under difficult circumstances and has built up a remarkable expertise in dealing with the problem of terrorism. For example, although the St. Mary Axe bomb blew the bomb car to smithereens, the City of London police scene of crime officers managed to scour through every fragment to discover sufficient evidence to identify the vehicle, which in turn led them to a suspect, and an arrest and charge have been made. Terrorism can be defeated, and one of the purposes of the Bill is to emphasise our support for the police service in that determination.

During the recent outrages, both in 1992 and this year, the citizens of the City of London, in common with the whole country, I believe, have greatly admired the leadership of both the previous and the present lord mayors of the City of London, and the determination of the corporation as a whole to rally and organise the commercial community so that the people who commit terrorist outrages do not succeed in their primary endeavour.

The proposals before us are necessary and welcome. I know that the Association of British Insurers was greatly concerned about the difficulties that it faced, to which my hon. Friend the Minister rightly referred. The mechanism that we propose to put in place will be both fair to the taxpayer and reasonable in its objective.

I thank my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade for the way in which he has responded to my concerns on behalf of my constituents in the city of Westminster who live in expensive blocks of flats which, as the Minister has explained, would have been treated as commercial properties, on which there would have been an especially high premium to pay. Many elderly people and people on lower than average incomes would have found the additional premiums hard to bear, and it was important that they should not become the victims of terrorist outrages by virtue of a substantial increase in their insurance premiums.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his practical and sensible response to that problem. As my hon. Friend the Minister has explained, for many people living in blocks of flats in my constituency, the additional premium, on a flat rate basis, may be no more than about £14. That is indeed bearable and, on behalf of my constituents, I am glad to thank the Government.

As for the commencement of the Bill, it is right on this exceptional occasion that the House should depart from its regular objection to retrospective legislation and ensure that the measure be made effective from 1 January this year. We breach no precedent in doing that; this is an exceptional measure to deal with a particular situation, and it is right that we should allow an element of retrospective legislation.

The Prime Minister responded to a question that I asked him after the Bishopsgate bomb by saying that the House would have such a measure before it at the earliest opportunity. My right hon. Friend has honoured that pledge in bringing the Bill before the House, and it is a matter for great satisfaction to us all that both sides of the House should be united in the endeavour to take the Bill speedily on to the statute book in the interests of defeating terrorism and supporting the British people.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am certainly glad to add my voice and that of the Liberal Democrats to welcome the proposals, especially as they end a degree of uncertainty that needed to be resolved in a constructive fashion. As a Member who represents a Scottish constituency and who believes that the United Kingdom needs some fundamental political changes, I must also say that such changes must be brought about by the democratic process.

There is no doubt that such a measure was essential, because there was a danger that the terrorists might have been given another target, in the sense of being able not only to maim and injure people but to seek to bring down corporations, too, and thus to create more economic disruption than the mere disruption of offices that results from the damage that they inflict.

The Government were right to seek a balance. We could not have witnessed too prolonged an exchange in which the Government were saying, fundamentally, that it was the responsibility of the insurance industry to take the risks, and the insurance industry was saying that it would withdraw altogether from that risk area. That gap could not have been allowed to continue for long, and we welcome the fact that the Government have understood that, and have introduced a scheme that seeks, in a sense, to go back into partnership with the industry and to ensure that the industry and the ultimate buyer of insurance make their contribution in terms that appear fair, balanced and reasonable.

There are people far better equipped than I to rake over the details and raise concerns and anomalies. The Minister said that the measure had been carefully thought through, but that the Government were willing to consider any representations that might be made. In view of the spirit in which the Bill has been introduced, I am sure that any such representations will be welcomed and accepted constructively.

There is justice in what the Government are trying to do. I cannot calculate exactly whether they have got the balance completely right, but the thrust is certainly right. Making the Government the insurer, or reinsurer, of last resort is the right approach, rather than providing blank-cheque compensation. The Minister made it clear that the virtue of that approach was that it retained the inherent merits of continuing to operate a proper insurance scheme that will probably function on normal commercial lines, with the consequent speed of response. Clearly that was necessary, and one hopes that it will eliminate wrangling.

I welcome the fact that the Minister made it clear that, while the objective of the Government's scheme is ultimately to achieve no cost, the guarantee is absolute, and the objective of no cost will not lead to any possibility of their failing to honour their reinsurance obligations. That is absolutely crucial, because the Government are the last resort, and if those obligations are not honoured there is nowhere else to turn.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) mentioned taxi drivers, and the Minister responded robustly and in a constructive way. Although the hon. Member will pursue his case, and I encourage him to do so and hope that he will secure a sympathetic response, it is very important that it is understood that, when this Bill becomes law, nobody is absolved of the obligation to make the calculation of insuring or not. It must be made very clear to people that, while it is regrettable that the climate in which we live has increased the costs that we have to bear, that calculation must be made. One cannot be foolhardy and try to cut corners, consequently leaving oneself exposed.

Nobody can be in any doubt that anybody who fails to take that necessary step will not be entitled to seek compensation from outside. It is important, and I am sure that the Government will make it clear, that that is fully understood as widely as possible.

The different scheme in Northern Ireland may be interesting as a comparison, because it is troubles arising from Northern Ireland that have made this scheme necessary. It unites all Members in the commitment to ensure that neither by commercial nor by physically violent means can terrorism prevail. I believe that some practical common sense and ingenuity has been shown here, and that the insurance industry has responded.

I spent a day at Lloyd's a few weeks ago, when I was made very well aware of the concern there about the fact that 3,000 people have effectively been ruined by that operation, and that many jobs will now be lost. It was made clear to me that, in addition to the large risks which the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) has already identified, the consequences of climatic change have had a serious effect upon Lloyd's, because it has led to a number of violent wind storms, for which Lloyd's was the reinsurer.

It may well be that, in its heyday, Lloyd's could have taken up the risk with which the Government are now faced. However, in the circumstances in which it is now placed, it would be very foolhardy indeed to add that risk to those from which it is still trying to recover.

I therefore welcome the fact that, after what might be described as initial spats—perhaps understandable and justifiable—between the Government and the insurance industry, the position taken by the Department of Trade and Industry in this Bill has prevailed, uncertainty and anxiety have been laid to rest, and a properly orchestrated scheme on a proper insurance basis will now be put in place to fill the gap from the day the insurance company withdrew the original cover.

I hope that the Bill can make speedy progress and that it will be noted outside the House that it had total all-party, all-Member support.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I begin by declaring some interest as having been involved in insurance for 20 years, as an adviser to the Institute of Insurance Brokers and as an elected member of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council. Perhaps more important on this issue, although it is not an interest to declare, we have an all-party insurance financial services group, which I chair and which has been very active in discussing with the Government and the industry how to deal with this dreadful problem of terrorism cover.

I pay a tribute to my hon. Friend, the Under-Secretary of State and to my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. They will know how difficult it has been for all of us, given the sensitivity of this issue, to discuss —I think that this will be taken in the right way—how to bring pressure to bear on the Government to recognise that something needed to be done. It was very late in December before we finally reached agreement on how to proceed, but the reception that our approach received was not just extremely courteous, but very understanding. The fact that this Bill and the scheme that it underwrites so closely reflect the general principles that we put to my hon. Friend and his colleagues and officials at the DTI clearly indicates that they listened very carefully to the representations of the industry.

I have said that I am a member of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council. Our office has been affected by both bombs. I was in Bishopsgate last week and I have seen the devastation caused by the second explosion. It left me with very mixed feelings. Above all, it strengthened my belief that, when we stand up in the House and say that terrorism will not prevail, that the bullet and bomb will not change the course of British politics or politics in Northern Ireland, it is not just because that has to be the way, but also because it is an absolute outrage that such acts should be perpetrated. I was moved by the way in which the people who work in the City, the police and the contractors putting right the damage carried on. They deserve the highest possible praise and support.

We have all said, in the wake of these two outrages in the City of London and others elsewhere throughout the United Kingdom, that the terrorists will not win; life goes on. This measure is designed to ensure that life can go on, that businesses can be up and running as quickly as is humanly possible.

In the discussion that we have had already, some concern has been expressed about whether the Bill as drafted can be retrospective to 1 January. I am in no doubt about that. As I understand it—perhaps my hon. Friend will confirm this in winding up—the Bill gives Parliament's approval to the Treasury paying out of public funds the money needed to underwrite Pool Re: in effect, to pay out money to support any agreement entered into by the President of the Board of Trade. He made that agreement at the end of last year, so what we are doing here is providing the funding for the agreement that he has already freely entered into.

Again, I pay a tribute to the Government for the way in which they so quickly made clear after the recent outrage in Bishopsgate that moneys would be forthcoming and that there would be no difficulty with this scheme because we had not yet passed the Bill through Parliament.

In his introductory speech, my hon. Friend talked about all those who consider themselves to be at risk and said that it was in their commercial interest to insure. I suggest that we should go further. I believe that we should discourage selection on the basis of whether people ought to have terrorist cover. It is a simplistic argument, but one does not say to one's insurance company that flood damage should be excluded because the house is on the top of a hill.

The whole principle of insurance is one of mutual cover, mutual risk and mutual funding. What we have seen in the past year or so must tell us all that no one can be sure where terrorists will choose to strike. Yes, there are some potential targets—we all acknowledge that—but I feel strongly that it is the duty of the House to discourage selection. I take my hon. Friend the Minister's point that there should not be compulsion, but I think that we should encourage businesses to avail themselves of the Pool Re facility. The Minister gave a vivid example of the fact that, in the full context of the overall picture of business costs, the costs of taking advantage of Pool Re in extra premium terms are very small.

There are two principles that business men ought to acknowledge: first, that it can happen to them, and, secondly, that, if it does, it will not affect their ability or the resolve of their businesses to continue. That means that every business needs a strategy for management of the risk that terrorism represents. That strategy embraces three elements. First, it must mean increased vigilance. My right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) rightly paid tribute to the work of the police in the City of London. Indeed, the police throughout London have done a tremendous job in the face of terrorist activities and we ought not to forget that many potential bomb threats have been intercepted with tremendous skill and with the use of intelligence. We need to get across the question of vigilance to the public and to the business community. I do not want to dwell on that point today because I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has made it clear that everything that can be done will be done in that regard.

Secondly, businesses must have an emergency plan. After the St. Mary Axe bomb, everybody was overwhelmed with admiration for the speed with which Commercial Union, the worst affected by the bomb, was able to respond. There has been no real impact on its business because it had an emergency plan ready to put into operation. Following that, many other businesses in the City of London did the same and those plans were put into effect speedily and with tremendous skill during the recent outrage in Bishopsgate. That is a lesson that businesses throughout the country need to take on board.

Thirdly, the element in the strategy on which I place the greatest reliance is the need for insurance. The Bill makes that possible. It is largely an enabling Bill and there is much detail still to be thrashed out. I know that the Department of Trade and Industry is approaching the Bill in a constructive way. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister acknowledges that if there are still some issues to rehearse in detail—issues that might have been rehearsed during the Committee stage of a similar Bill—such rehearsal would not be appropriate tonight. There will be an opportunity to raise concerns directly with him and his officials will be available at a later stage.

Will my hon. Friend think again about the need for a separate certificate of insurance for terrorism? I should have preferred us to deal with the issue in the following way. Everyone has made it clear that unless one takes advantage of the Pool Re facility or makes some other arrangement, one will not be insured. It is clear to the policyholder on the renewal documents, which have been sent out by insurance companies since the end of last year, that the £100,000 limit per item of claim is clear and that everything else is excluded. For that reason, we can perhaps avoid the need for a separate certificate of insurance for terrorism when people buy cover in future.

I was also encouraged by what my hon. Friend the Minister said about the need to contain bureaucracy and to make the scheme as simple as possible. There is a problem about the degree of information that has to be provided to obtain quotations. However, I welcome the fact that the Department has agreed to review its requirements in that area.

Commission is another relevant point. When we put the scheme together and asked the Government to be reinsurers of last resort, I argued strongly that there should not be a commission element on the extra payment into the pool. With hindsight, I think that that was a mistake. I believe that there should be some element of commission for two reasons. First, it is important that businesses take up the cover, so we need to have some incentive. Secondly, brokers may try to seek alternative markets for cover which pay commission and that would undermine the viability of the Pool Re scheme. I shall come to the point about alternatives in a moment. There is a significant work load in relation to the scheme itself and in relation to claims. I believe, therefore, that we should re-examine the commission argument.

Other reinsurance schemes are being considered. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) raised the point about potential problems with the EC over competition policy. We have agreed that there should not be compulsion. No one suggests that every business man is being compelled to insure through the scheme. Alternatives will be provided—indeed, I understand that that is happening already. For that reason, I encourage everyone to take advantage of Pool Re.

Over three to five years, there is no reason why the scheme should not be in equilibrium in terms of funding and there is no reason why the objective that we all sought to achieve at the beginning of the exercise—that there should be no ultimate cost to the taxpayer—should not be achieved.

I give a warm welcome to the Bill. I again thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his work so far and for the work that he will continue to do on this important matter.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): I, too, welcome the opportunity to raise matters pertaining to insurance in this debate. It is clear from the number of hon. Members who have remained to take part in the debate that the subject is serious, especially because the problems of Northern Ireland are now transferring to the mainland. Many people are extremely concerned about what is happening. I have no time for terrorism, as I have stated in the past. What is happening will cause severe grief unless serious action is taken to try to resolve the situation in Northern Ireland. However, I am here to speak not about the position in Northern Ireland, but about insurance claims.

In the past year in my constituency and in my area, we have had several problems with terrorism. A bomb was left at White Hart Lane station in my constituency and a bomb went off in Wood Green shopping city in my area. Garages in Muswell Hill have been raided and explosives have been found. So the situation is serious and I for one am angry that the IRA should seek to use terrorist methods at all, but certainly not in working-class areas where the people are poor and must struggle to make a living. It is particularly in this regard that I wish to look at the question of insurance.

I welcome the Bill and I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) said. I was interested in his point about the Government's intervention in this specific area. I, too, am pleased that they are intervening. It is not usual for this Government to intervene—they talk about market forces taking care of everything—yet here we see them directly intervening. I believe that one of the reasons for their intervention is their moral obligation to look after the security of everyone—big business, my constituents and everyone else. So they feel that they must do something to protect people's security.

The Government must protect not only the interests and property of rich people in the City, but the interests and property of people in my area, working-class people. It is in this regard that I mention two of my constituents who were the minicab drivers involved in incidents on the same night as the NatWest tower and other buildings in the City were blown up.

One of my constituents was approached by two men, one of whom held a gun to his head. The second man got into the seat beside him and they ordered him to drive towards various destinations. The driver of one of the minicabs told me that the person sitting next to him was priming the bomb, putting the wires together, setting the timer and so on, right next to him in the same vehicle. After they had been going some time, they placed the bomb, now live, underneath his seat and, with a gun to his head, told him to drive to 10 Downing street. They took away the wing mirrors and inside rear mirror and told him that they would be driving behind him and that if he tried to stop or leave the vehicle they would shoot him. Then they got out.

My constituent then set off for Downing street, but after he had gone about 50 yards he stopped his cab, got out of it, hailed a bus driver who was passing and, with his help, contacted the police. He himself stood in the road, waved people down, told them that there was a bomb in the car and stopped other people being injured. After some time the police came, the place was cordoned off and the car blew up. Roughly the same thing happened to my second constituent whose car stopped somewhere in the King's Cross area.

I mention these points because this was not just a case of people abandoning their cars and running for their lives. The two people concerned acted in a very public-spirited manner and saved not only their own lives but the lives of others in the vicinity. In doing so they were able to prevent any destruction of property as well as of lives.

Since the incident my constituents have experienced a number of problems. First, they are unable to claim compensation. This is where we come to the question of the insurance. I understand that, for various reasons, these drivers took out a hire and reward insurance third party only, which means that if they have an accident and the other party suffers damage they are covered for that, but their own vehicles are not insured and they get no compensation from the insurance company for them.

That is what concerns me because, while the Minister may say that they have the option of going for comprehensive insurance, which would have given them compensation, the fact is that when my constituents took out insurance they did not expect that the IRA would hold a gun to their heads, put bombs in their cars and blow them to bits. It is not, therefore, a normal, everyday risk, and that is my argument. They acted properly in getting third party insurance as required by law. They had no idea that they would be in this situation. It is not an everyday occurrence. It may be that in Northern Ireland, where such things happen fairly regularly, minicab drivers will accept the possibility of being forced to take on board a terrorist bomb and will see the need to insure against it specifically. But here on the mainland it is not a regular occurrence, so we cannot expect drivers to take on such liabilities. Now that it has happened on at least three occasions, minicab drivers will be well advised in future to take out comprehensive insurance, but at the moment, because such things have seldom happened, they feel it unnecessary to take out the full insurance.

On that basis, I appeal to the Minister to find some way of getting compensation for these drivers. They are self-employed people whose livelihood has been totally destroyed, and because they cannot claim compensation they cannot work.

I asked the Library to give me some advice on compensation. I was told that if the drivers' cars had been burnt during a riot or looting or something like that, under the Riot Act they would have been compensated. If a person's car is set on fire by a bunch of football hooligans, for example, he can get compensation from the police, but if it is blown up by the IRA and set on fire he cannot claim compensation.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman has answered his own point. The purpose of the Bill is not to provide compensation but merely to provide at a commercial premium rate an insurance service which otherwise would not be available. Similarly, in the case of damage to real property, in circumstances where an insured had not taken out an insurance policy covering it for the particular kind of damage which was suffered, the provisions of the Bill would not provide retrospectively compensation to pay for the damage suffered. So we are not treating the owners of commercial real property in any way differently from the owners of motor cars, as in the case that the hon. Gentleman has brought before the House this afternoon. We are seeking to plug a gap in the market, although the Bill will apply to contracts of insurance entered into as from 1 January. We are not bringing in a compensation scheme.

Mr. Grant: I thank the Minister for that. I understand and support what the Bill is doing. What I am demonstrating to the Minister is that there is a loophole in insurance law generally. I do not say that an amendment could not be tabled—I do not know how things are done—but, although I support the Bill, I am suggesting that this is something else to be looked at. Not only have problems arisen about compensation and loss of livelihood, but the men concerned have been offered no protection. One suspected person has been identified and arrested and, at some stage, my constituents will be called on to give evidence against the people concerned, but no protection has been provided for them.

Those men are totally traumatised, but have had no counselling. One of my constituents is a refugee from Ethiopia. He told me yesterday that he had run away from a traumatic situation there only to arrive in Britain and find himself in another traumatic situation. Perhaps it was because of his experience of dangerous situations in Ethiopia that he was able to act in a public-spirited manner and prevent a further tragedy.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who spoke for the insurance groups, rightly talked about how brave the City workers were to go back to work and about the good work of the fire brigade and the police. I agree with him, but my constituents have also had a very traumatic experience. No one has said that they are brave. No one has been to see them; the Prime Minister has not written to them to thank them for not delivering the bombs that they were ordered to deliver. When we give praise to people like the workers who turned up for work the next day, I hope that the people in high positions will also think about my constituents who also had a very traumatic experience.

I hope that there are no more incidents, but, being pragmatic and the situation being what it is, I suspect that there might be. I would like the Government to consider whether there is a way in which my constituents, who have only third party insurance, can be helped. People in my constituency are working for £80 per week; they have to struggle to pay the insurance premium before they can go out and earn their living. I am not talking about people who have a lot of money and can afford to pay £2,000 for comprehensive insurance. One of the cars which was blown up was worth only £1,500, so paying £2,000 for comprehensive insurance is just not worth it. I would be very pleased if some arrangement could be made whereby the Government make an ex gratia payment in recognition of my constituents' actions.

The owners of the minicab firm—Alan's Minicab Services—have set up a trust fund for the people concerned because they, other minicab drivers and the local people feel that something should be done for them. I hope that the Government can find a way in which to ensure that people who are caught, by poverty, with third party insurance obtain some compensation or relief from the problems that they have been forced into facing.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am sure that the whole House will have considerable sympathy for the two constituents of the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant), both of whom acted in a completely publicly spirited manner.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and my hon. Friend the Minister on introducing the Bill. Towards the end of last year they responded very quickly to the situation that arose, when it became clear that there would be no possibility of reinsurance in the market. I know that the way in which they responded to events in the market has been widely welcomed by insurance companies and insurance brokers. I am an adviser to the British Investment and Insurance Brokers Association and I can tell the House that it, too, welcomes the Bill.

We are all very conscious of the background against which the Bill is introduced. I reiterate what every hon. Member has already said—that a measure of this kind is essential if we are to demonstrate to the IRA our determination that they will not win under any circumstances.

I shall ask my hon. Friend the Minister one or two questions about the Bill. In some respects, the Bill could be described, I think he might agree, as a bit of a blank cheque. It does not have a date on it and I would like a date to be inserted, even if the agreement has the date 1 January 1993, which I understand to be the case.

When my hon. Friend responds to the debate, will he give some information about how he will report on financial progress? If we give the Government a blank cheque in this respect, we will need regular information about how the scheme is progressing. My hon. Friend described the Bill as a market solution. I welcome the fact that it is as near to a market solution as we can achieve, given that it involves Government intervention, as has been recognised. I believe that Government intervention is justified where there is market failure, as in this case, and I commend my hon. Friend's scheme. I take my hon. Friend's point that, in the long run, there will be no cost to the taxpayer. That is what we hope and believe.

It is just not the case that it is a market solution, with low costs and, in the end, no cost to the taxpayer. There may be considerable costs to the taxpayer in the interim period because of cash flow disadvantages. The Government may sometimes have to pay out large sums of money and be unable to recover them until some subsequent, unspecified time.

For that reason, it would be helpful if we could hear a little more about the arrangements for reporting on what happens to Pool Re, which is a company limited by guarantee, as my hon. Friend the Minister explained. Presumably, like any other limited liability company, it will, in due course, file accounts at Companies House. We will then be able to judge the position of the company, some months after the end of its financial year. Does my hon. Friend have other proposals in mind for reporting on how things go?

Perhaps my hon. Friend can tell us how things have gone so far, because we are now in month five of the new arrangement. It would be helpful to know about the extent to which, to date, people have participated in the new arrangement and the amounts of premiums that have been paid into the company. It would also be helpful to know whether my hon. Friend believes that it may be necessary to pay any claims arising from the Bishopsgate bomb.

Those factors are important when one reads the financial memorandum, which states—I understand why it could say nothing else—that "no precise estimate is possible" of the cost to the Government of the arrangements envisaged. Although my hon. Friend has said that the costs to the taxpayer will be low and that, in the end, the taxpayer will not lose out, I should like to hear about the arrangements for reporting on progress.

I reaffirm my support for the Bill, which has the universal support of the House. In the circumstances, the Bill is essential and I wish my hon. Friend every success in implementing it.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): In common with every hon. Member who has spoken in the debate, I support the Bill. Although it is not the right measure to deal with the issue, I accept that it is necessary that something should be done. The Bill and the scheme that it underwrites at least have the merit of being put into operation speedily. In an ideal world, however, I would suggest that the Government should adopt a different scheme.

The event that finally galvanised the Government into acting on the problem was the bombing last year of the Baltic Exchange. The subsequent events were not surprising, but at the time of the bomb, what struck those of us who represent Northern Ireland were the incredible estimates of loss that were produced. People immediately produced estimates of £700 million and more. At that time last year the total bill for all the bombing incidents in Northern Ireland over 20 years, in terms of criminal damage payments, was significantly less than that. I do not have the precise figures with me, but I think £400 million to £500 million would be on the high side. Yet so-called insurance experts produced such incredible figures.

As Mr. McKittrick, The Independent correspondent, rightly said recently in a newspaper article, after the Baltic Exchange bomb the Republican leadership was "surprised and delighted" at what was said—surprised because, evidently, it did not expect the bill for damage to be so high, and delighted at the panic-stricken reaction. It was inevitable, in the light of that, that there would be more bombs in London. It is further inevitable following the reaction after Bishopsgate, for we saw the same degree of exaggeration. That applied to reaction in terms of estimates, with people talking straightaway about a bill of £1 billion, and making exaggerated comments about the scale of the damage.

I wish London journalists would learn to tell the difference between structural and superficial damage. There was serious structural damage to the church outside which the bomb was placed, but it was obvious to anybody looking at the huge photographs in the newspapers, which occupied far too much space, that the damage to the office blocks was entirely superficial. I was in London on that Saturday morning. I was travelling to Liverpool street station when the bomb went off. Lest people are curious about that, I should perhaps explain that I was travelling for the entirely innocent purpose of going to Essex for an Orange parade. The following day I was in Belfast and had a chance to catch up with the papers and look at the photographs. It was clear to me and my colleagues there that the damage was superficial.

I wish that people would be more restrained in that respect. They should also accept that businesses must learn from the regrettable experience of their counterparts in Northern Ireland, who have had to deal with the situation for far too long. It is possible to have contingency plans. Businesses should gear the way in which they operate to enable them to get back into operation quickly. Regrettably, we in Northern Ireland have had to get back to business quickly. It can be done. It is not the end of the world. Indeed, that is one way in which the man in the street and the ordinary business man can do his bit to beat terrorism. He can demonstrate that it is possible to get back to business quickly and without any undue fuss.

Although there have been two major bombs, Bishopsgate and the Baltic Exchange, the point must be made—this is why I said that we are debating a belated measure—that the danger of major incidents such as those has existed for a long time. That danger still exists and it is greater than people in England realise. For some time, the Provisional IRA has probably—I say "probably" because I cannot be precise—been putting greater resources into its bombing campaign in England than into its entire terrorist operation in Northern Ireland. By greater resources, I mean the commitment of skilled manpower, money and the rest.

Over the years, the IRA has built up an infrastructure in England which enables it to conduct a sustained campaign. Last year, more than 20 tonnes of home-made explosives were recovered in London alone—and every last ounce of that was probably manufactured in London. I asked the Home Secretary a question about that in the middle of last year, and although he did not disagree with the estimate he did not do what he should have done and make the public aware of the position. Manufacturing home-made explosive takes time and a large number of people. If the public are properly alerted about what to look out for, it should be possible for them to play their part in suppressing the campaign, but they must be told how to be vigilant and how to assist the authorities. It does no good in the current situation to pretend that there is not a problem and thus fail to involve the public fully in the fight against terrorism. A tremendous resource is available in terms of potential public support, but it is not being fully utilised.

The Minister referred to comparable arrangements in Northern Ireland and said that legislation had existed both in Northern Ireland and in Ireland to deal with costs arising out of this kind of situation, and he is right—it has existed for not far short of 300 years. I should welcome the opportunity to dilate on some of the advantages of that 18th century legislation, which contains some interesting features. Any hon. Member who wishes to discuss the matter with me is welcome to do so after the debate.

The Bill applies to Great Britain and its provisions do not extend to Northern Ireland. May I be assured that in no circumstances will the provisions be extended to Northern Ireland, that the existing Northern Ireland legislation will remain substantially in place and that the cover and provisions for compensation will not be diminished by any temptation to extend provisions of this type to Northern Ireland? I want that assurance because I consider the provisions in the Bill to be inadequate. They are not good enough, and they are certainly not so good as the statutory provisions in Northern Ireland. I should hate to see the Northern Ireland position undermined as a result of the introduction of measures such as these. We in Northern Ireland do not want to be driven back into taking a market-based approach, particularly in view of the record of some English financial institutions in regard to the problems of Belfast over the years. Apart from that, I am referring to a matter of general principle.

Hon. Members may have gathered that I regard the provisions in Northern Ireland as better than those in the Bill. They are better because the statutory provisions in Northern Ireland are comprehensive. This reinsurance arrangement will not be comprehensive. Under the existing provisions in Northern Ireland, wherever property is damaged as the result of violence or terrorist activity there is provision for compensation. Under the reinsurance arrangement before the House, compensation insurance will be available only to people who first take out insurance to cover the terrorist risk.

I made that point in an intervention in the speech of the Minister, and it was made by the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) when he referred to people who lost out in the incident of which he spoke. He paid tribute to those people, and I underwrite that tribute. They behaved in a highly responsible and brave way, but even if they had not behaved so bravely I should have thought that they would still have a good claim on the public purse for compensation. And it is not just taxi drivers—the same could happen to anyone. Any driver could find his or her car being hijacked and used for a similar purpose. Must every person who owns a car in Britain stop and think about the risk? The Minister said that people who felt themselves to be at risk should take out additional insurance. How can the man in the street or the ordinary business man assess the risk that he may be facing?

It is wrong to think that the risk exists only in the City of London. We know how adept the Provisional IRA is at switching from one area to another. As soon as it is anticipated that the IRA will do one thing, it switches and does the unexpected. That is the way terrorist organisations operate—the risk could be anywhere. We have reason to suspect that there is a significant terrorist infrastructure in London. There is also reason to suspect that there is a significant terrorist infrastructure in the north-west of England. There may be others elsewhere. We do not know what structures have been set up. We do not know what sleepers there are elsewhere. The risk is not confined to certain geographic locations or to certain categories of persons. The risk is more general.

It is inadequate to say to the public, "You should take action only if you feel yourselves at risk." The reason why legislation was originally introduced for Ireland in the 18th century, which was not a period of Government interventionism, was that it was recognised—correctly—that there is a particular responsibility upon Governments to maintain public order. That is one of the primary purposes of Government. What we are dealing with here are the risks and the damage which affect people as a result of a failure to maintain public order. That is why there is compensation for riot damage, and that is why there ought also to be compensation for damage caused by terrorists.

The primary advantage of the legislation in Northern Ireland is that it is comprehensive. Another of its advantages is that there is a degree of governmental control. Because the compensation scheme is administered by the Government, they have a measure of control over its operation. After major terrorist incidents, one serious danger is that there will be fraudulent claims. What measures will be taken, in terms of the Pool Reinsurance agreements, to cover that? Will the Government just rely upon the insurance companies to detect fraud? Will the insurance companies have an economic interest in detecting fraud, or will they be tempted to pass on the risk to the insurer of last resort, the Government?

Under the criminal damage legislation, there is a statutory framework within which one can determine the extent of consequential loss. What will be the position under these arrangements? Will the extent of cover for consequential loss differ from one insurance company to another, with the Government merely picking up the tab through the pool, or will policies contain standard terms to ensure equal cover?

What will happen about betterment? That is a significant problem. When there is damage of this nature, the person whose property is destroyed gets new for old when he rebuilds, and in some respects is better off. One suspects that some businesses in Northern Ireland have prospered because of the number of times that they have been blown up. I am thinking of hotel businesses. The result is that now they have much bigger and better hotels than they ever had to begin with. An ironic consequence of the campaign is this question of betterment. What provision will be made by insurance policies to deal with it? There may be other factors, too.

I will say no more about the Northern Ireland legislation. I merely say that I believe that the Northern Ireland scheme is superior to this one. It may have been thought necessary to introduce this legislation because it is speedy and setting up a proper compensation scheme would take longer, but the best thing to do in the long run is to have a proper compensation scheme.

This last-minute measure, which the Minister says is temporary, smacks to some extent of the Government's whole approach to the problem of terrorism—a little half-hearted and a little too late. The Government are not committed to dealing with the problem. I detected that approach in the Minister's final comments. He referred to the underlying problem and said that terrorism would not succeed because the IRA had failed to move the Government an inch. That ought to be the position—I wish to God it were—but everyone knows that it is not.

Terrorist operations have moved the Government quite a considerable distance in terms of compromising the integrity of the United Kingdom, in terms of eliminating the democratic process in Northern Ireland, in terms of giving the parties which share the objectives of terrorism a say in the government of Northern Ireland, and sometimes in terms of appearing, as the Government did in the recent talks, to be neutral about the Union. The way to defeat terrorism is to be positive about the Union and to demonstrate clearly that the Government oppose not just the means that the terrorists adopt but also their objectives.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The House has listened with keen interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). Having served as a Northern Ireland Minister, I understand the points that he made. I agree with him completely that Great Britain has a great deal to learn from Northern Ireland in terms of its response to terrorist incidents and in terms of showing its determination not to be overwhelmed by terrorist pressure.

The fact that sometimes the media get over-excited may lead to a misinterpretation of the public's attitude to terrorism. The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) spoke movingly on behalf of his constituents. He showed in his graphic speech, to which we listened with keen interest, just how widespread the damage done by terrorism can be and how completely universal is the revulsion against terrorism.

To follow up one point that was made by the hon. Member for Upper Bann, it is not for me to answer on behalf of the Government, but the hon. Gentleman said that there is a significant difference between the Northern Ireland and Great Britain schemes. He praised the benefits of the Northern Ireland scheme and asked what would happen about betterment in the Great Britain scheme.

As I understand it, the scheme for Great Britain which we are now discussing walks around that problem. The initiative for sorting out the problem will remain with insurance companies. The Government will merely stand behind them and prevent insurance schemes from being blown aside by the present lack of reinsurance. The detailed problem relating to betterment will not arise under the Great Britain scheme, because control over that matter will remain with the insurance companies.

I asked the Minister to spell out the difference between the proposed scheme for Great Britain and the scheme that operates in Northern Ireland. I thought it appropriate that it should be on the record that there is a difference between the two schemes; I thought it appropriate, too, that the Government's explanation of why there should be a different scheme for Great Britain should be on the record. When I asked that question, I was not seeking to suggest that the Great Britain scheme should be comparable to the Northern Ireland scheme. The two situations are different. Therefore, I warmly welcome the scheme that the Minister has laid before the House today. I believe it to be the right scheme for Great Britain.

I declare an interest, to which I referred during my intervention. I am an elected member of the council of Lloyd's of London, and since 1973 I have been an underwriting member of Lloyd's. I declare that interest in much the same way as a house owner might declare an interest when the value of his mortgage exceeds the value of his house. It is a negative interest this year. Nevertheless, I declare my interest in Lloyd's with pride, for it has been the focal point of insurance in the United Kingdom for the past 300 years. It is a crucial part of the success of the City of London in making London the centre of the insurance market.

Lloyd's leads in most major insurance risks and is now fighting valiantly, in my view, to put its house in order so as to win back the confidence that has certainly been prejudiced and lost as a result of the terrible losses of recent years. I am confident that Lloyd's will fight its way back. In parentheses, may I say that Lloyd's very much appreciates the interest and the understanding of its situation that has been shown by the Minister and the staff of the Department of Trade and Industry. Having said that, however, I must point out that I do not in any sense speak on behalf of Lloyd's. My speech is entirely on my own account.

It was necessary that a scheme such as this should be brought before the House. Late in 1992, it became apparent that the reinsurance interests—the big continental and American reinsurance companies and groups, through which much of the insurance of the City of London and other parts of the United Kingdom is frequently placed—had been destabilised and that they were not confident about continuing their reinsurance arrangements. The result was that the insurance market was destabilised. Therefore, it became necessary to introduce a stabilising element.

I believe that I was the first to raise this issue on the Floor of the House, late in 1992. I did so with diffidence, because I was sad to think that a stabilisation measure should be necessary. Nevertheless, it was necessary. Industrial interests made this very clear to the Government. The insurance industry was not making the point that it required support or subsidy; it was spelling out in clear terms the fact that insurance would not be available if reinsurance were not available and that if insurance in the City of London were not available it might be impossible for companies to continue to operate there. Thus the position of the City as a world capital market might be under threat.

There is no question of insurance interests seeking support subsidy in that sense. What they need is stability. In urging the Government to act, they were not speaking on their own behalf. It is quite clear that they were pushing at a door that was ready to open. The Government were looking carefully at the whole issue and Ministers were quick to come forward with an appropriate measure. I repeat that there is no question of this Bill's representing a subsidy for the insurance industry. The medium-term intention is that it should be a stabilising measure and that it should be neutral in terms of Government cost. I suspect that in the short term there will be an element of subsidy. A number of matters will have to be explored very carefully in Committee. These days, every Bill states whether there will be an additional demand by way of public-sector manpower. I see that in this case two additional posts in the Department of Trade and Industry will be required. I am afraid that the two people appointed will have to work extremely hard in the next year or two.

Of all industries, the insurance industry is international and is responsive to market forces. I have already referred to the fact that, although London is the centre of the insurance world, it uses extensive overseas reinsurance facilities. As the industry is so international and so responsive to market forces, premiums will respond quickly to perceived risk. I believe that the situation will stabilise rapidly, thanks to the measures that are being taken.

I welcome the Bill. It will stabilise the industry and, in due course, enable the Government to withdraw. As I have said already, many points will have to be raised in Committee. I am sure that hon. Members look forward to making their points at that stage. In the meantime, I thank the Government for introducing the measure, which I thoroughly welcome.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred to the memorandum on the financial effects of the Bill. I should like to quote part of the explanation:

> "The costs to the Government of the arrangements envisaged will depend on the level of terrorist damage suffered by properties covered by the arrangement, and therefore no precise estimate is possible."

That arises from the peculiar circumstances of the measure, and I do not want to argue against it in any way. Essentially, what we are dealing with is an IRA bombing campaign in this country. However, the Bill is general and will apply to any type of terrorist activity. Clause 2(2), in defining an act of terrorism, does not refer simply to acts intended to overthrow Her Majesty's Government or to influence them by force or violence. Other Governments are included. I am thinking of the embassies of other countries, whether the Governments of those countries are de jure or de facto. Presumably, if an attack were made on the mission of Eritrea—a country that has not yet been formally recognised but is likely to be recognised on 24 May—it could be dealt with as would be an attack on a subsequent embassy. We are dealing with a general legal situation, although it has its origins in IRA activity.

Businesses can take certain action to contain the cost and lessen the impact of terrorism. In this regard, they ought to direct their attention to the moral, political and financial support that can be given to organisations—many of them in Northern Ireland—that try bravely to face up to terrorist activity, whether of the IRA or of Protestant paramilitary organisations such as the UDA. It should be recognised that there are people who seek to undermine bodies such as the IRA and to remove the conditions in which they can develop. This is a matter to which commercial interests would do well to pay some attention.

The Peace Train organisation was formed as a result of the disruption of rail services, especially between Dublin and Belfast. The purpose of disruption is to have traffic moved from the railway to other types of transport that are susceptible to rackets. In addition, the British troops who have to clear railway lines that have been tampered with are vulnerable. Although there has recently been some similar IRA activity, the Peace Train organisation has been quite successful. Following deaths at railway stations and explosions on railway lines in this country, the Peace Train people organised a run from Belfast, through Dublin, Dun Laoghaire and Holyhead to Euston. People from 17 political parties in Northern Ireland, the Irish Republic and Britain were involved, and the President of the Republic, Mary Robinson, gave her support.

It is important that businesses should support such activities. Obviously, many people who have no party political connections are involved. I refer in particular to a group called Families Against Intimidation and Terror. In Northern Ireland, the IRA and the UDA try to operate no-go areas in which they take charge of law and order. When there is lawlessness in an area, such people try to move in and take over from the proper authorities. Knee-capping is one manifestation. The IRA shoots up Catholics, and Protestant paramilitary organisations shoot up Protestants.

It is good to have an organisation in which Protestants and Catholics unite against such activities. A very impressive meeting, involving three Protestants and two Catholics from Ireland, took place in this building. The common experience of those people obviously affects businesses in Northern Ireland. These are moves with which we ought to be associated. There are many community organisations and bodies such as the Irish Association, Co-operation North, Glencree, Women Together, Lurgan Interfriendship, the Peace People—and Peace '93 which emerged after the Warrington bombing and held a massive rally in Dublin. Business needs to be aware of those organisations because they could have an impact on how the legislation operates.

I am associated with one such group, New Consensus, which operates in Ireland and in Northern Ireland; there is also a group in Britain. I am privileged to be one of its presidents, together with the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) and Lord Hylton, who is a Cross-Bencher. I hope that that shows what needs to happen here and in Northern Ireland on a cross-party, cross-community basis. The people whose names appear on the letterhead of that organisation are from different parties, as are the vice-presidents—my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and the hon. Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox). Not only do the presidents and vice-presidents represent different parties but my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles and I represent different wings of the same party. Such activity should be encouraged——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman's remarks should relate to the Bill.

Mr. Barnes: I am grateful that you have been so generous, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the points that I have made so far. I think that they were relevant to the measure because of the expenditure that the Government may be involved in due to acts of terrorism. What is needed is action that begins to undermine the development and the growth of terrorism. There are things which business can do to assist that. That was the logic of the points that I was making.

The debate has been fascinating. Quite often, hon. Members make similar speeches and have party briefs to speak to. Usually, different parties argue different positions. So far, the contributions to the debate have represented different interests. My hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) made a telling contribution. If we were debating the politics of Northern Ireland, hon. Members might have different views on the way forward and on how to undermine the activities of terrorists, but hon. Members are united on the Bill.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I wish first to make two apologies and to pay one tribute. My first apology is to the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) for missing his speech. I heard the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister, but I had to leave the Chamber to pay a tribute to Robert Adley and did not hear the speech of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough.

My second apology is not to anyone in the House. When one of my constituents, Stephen Lawrence, was murdered recently, I would have liked to have had the chance to raise in the House the unprovoked racial attack which resulted in the murder of a fine young man who was black. There may be another occasion when I can do that, but I wish to say to his family that issues relating to terrorism are no more important than the incident which caused them such suffering.

My tribute is to my hon. Friend the Minister. There has been a general welcome for the Bill, in which I join. I also pay tribute to the way in which my hon. Friend introduced it. He did not give way to the temptations which were obviously present. The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) was right that avoiding exaggerated reaction to the aims of terrorists helps reduce what they achieve.

People who set off bombs and who carry out assassinations, whether they have picked out targets or are casual about whom they kill, seek publicity and public reaction. That public reaction may include what insurers feel that they may or may not be able to afford to provide cover for. The public reaction may include what the Government decide that they should properly do. Certainly, it includes what the Provisional IRA was trying to achieve in the mid-1970s and failed to do in the mid-1990s, which was to drive a wedge between the Irish and British communities.

It is becoming ever clearer that there is no wedge between the Irish and the British. The Warrington bomb helped to focus attention on a development over the past 10 years: that more and more Irish people are saying openly, "This is not done in our name." That is a very important thing for the Irish to say. It is important for those of us who are in part Irish, or in large part not Irish, to be able to stand with the people in the Irish community in Dublin, Belfast and London and say that we understand what the terrorists, the bombers and the killers are trying to achieve.

The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) made an impressive speech. His points could not properly be answered by one Minister. The Minister who will reply to the debate can only say that some of those points do not concern the departmental interest which he covers.

I do not believe that the Bill should be amended to cover the point, but when we think of all the interests involved—the insurance interest, the City interest and the national interest—if we cannot enable the two heroic minicab drivers to carry on with their trade, by providing insurance cover and vehicles, we are not the sort of country that I believe we are.

Perhaps someone in the City of London corporation could find out whether, by passing round a hat or by applying to an existing fund, the minicab drivers could be put at least in the position that they were in before they were commissioned to take bombs to Downing street and elsewhere. When awards are being made for valour or gallantry, I think that most people would regard it as appropriate that they should receive such public recognition.

As to the points made by the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), it is important to reduce the costs of insurance, reinsurance and guarantees to Pool Reinsurance. There are different ways of doing that. Some, which are for another debate, are hard security measures. We do not want to turn the City of London, the city of Westminster or any other part of the United Kingdom into a no-go area because that is not what a free and open society is about. Part of the solution is to continue showing in various ways that the terrorists—this applies to disloyalists just as much as to the Provisional IRA—are not achieving what they are after. If we can understand some of the underlying grievances, and say so out loud, they will be less able to exploit them in recruiting people to their illegal criminal substitute for politics.

We must also recognise that bombs are set off and people are murdered to get publicity and public reaction. We must turn that against the terrorists. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East made a passing reference to the Peace Train. When I was a Minister in Northern Ireland, I was responsible for railways. I leave with the House one experience. On most days, the rail service was interrupted by bombs, hoax bombs, calls and hoax calls. The IRA was trying to get the same publicity as that which followed a tragic level-crossing crash at Slaght outside Ballymena, which was not terrorist-related. The IRA knew that it was not possible, either in the City of London or on a railway line in Northern Ireland, for the security forces and the railways to be able to react almost perfectly to every incident. Therefore, it tried to cause the sorts of deaths and crashes that we saw outside Ballymena. For six weeks after that, there was no interruption to the railway service.

It is possible to turn the publicity and public reaction against the IRA. I hope that one memorial to Edward Henty will be a newspaper drive for understanding of what people want when they have the sort of explosions with which the Bill is partly designed to cope.

Without straying too far from the Bill, it is worth saying that, in my experience of working across the denominations in central America and South Africa, every group that would otherwise have turned to using bombs if they wanted to make a point, either in their own country or perhaps in London—I should say in passing that we still do not know who caused the bomb in New York; it could have been an IRA-related bomb or one linked to Yugoslavia——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is stretching it now. The Chair was patient with and understanding of the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes), but allusions to New York and South Africa go way beyond the scope of the Bill. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) should either come back to the Bill or draw his remarks to a conclusion.

Mr. Bottomley: I anticipated guidance from the Chair because I was about to say that, if we want people to understand why we need to control the public expenditure costs related to the Bill—I would not anticipate guidance that that was out of order—we need to understand that it is not done simply by a reinsurance pool. Establishing the pool or providing a guarantee if the pool is exhausted leads to increased public expenditure which it is the primary duty of the 651 hon. Members in the House, whether they are below the Gangway or occupy the Speaker's Chair, to reduce.

Reference has been made to the need to deliver public order—we were reminded of that by the hon. Member for Upper Bann and other hon. Members. The point is that other people have given up violence when they have the opportunity to vote. In the House, we have the opportunity of debate as well.

Those who are concerned about reducing their insurance premium—that is, for insurance up to £100,000—and those who will pay extra to the pool should accept the invitation to consider other ways of reducing the background to the events against which they are protecting themselves and against which the House and the Government are trying to protect them. That does not simply mean understanding why it is wrong for people to let off bombs and bullets and why it is important to understand the words of the seven-year-old to her parents after the Baltic Exchange bomb, "Why are they trying to hurt me?" Such a question can draw a response from those around the disloyalists and the Provisional IRA. Effectively, the cross on which that girl is put becomes as important and as powerful as the cross on a ballot paper. In the end, those two forms of the cross will outfight the bombers and those using guns to intimidate or kill others.

I suspect that if people in the city—I do not mean simply the city of London, because the cities of Westminster, Warrington, Manchester, Leicester and so on are also important—understand that they can provide support to non-governmental organisations, which may be by small amounts of money but mainly by a degree of interest, we shall find that in the United Kingdom, as in other countries around the world, the terrorists will understand that they will not be successful with their present methods.

There are ways to increase understanding, but I recommend that people should not simply listen to this debate. When a book called "May the Lord in his Mercy be Kind to Belfast" by Tony Parker is published next week, people will get a greater understanding and be able to share in such debates inside the Chamber and outside.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): To follow the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley)—without testing your patience or tolerance, Mr. Deputy Speaker—they were talking about a reinsurance policy. It was not necessarily the reinsurance policy in the Bill, but, nevertheless, an important reinsurance policy for future peace in these islands.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East because earlier this week I followed him when we were talking about ending violence in another part of the world—in Africa—and seeing how the pieces can be picked up after a 30-year war and contributions made towards that. In this debate, we are talking about a similar period of violence and destruction and how we can help to ensure that the pieces are picked up.

This measure will not defeat terrorism, but it will help to ensure that the objectives of terrorism are not achieved. Terrorism has many forms, but the terrorism that we see, especially in this island, is aimed at a number of objectives. My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham paid tribute to constituents of the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant), and we all share that. The spirit to which he referred is a British spirit, although it incorporates someone who came to the United Kingdom from Ethiopia. That spirit is the reason why the aim of killing and maiming cannot succeed.

In my constituency, I have had attempts to disrupt services—two bombs were placed on railway lines outside Clapham Junction. Neither of those attempts succeeded because the people who run and organise the services got going again. Within half an hour of my being on those sites, the trains were running and people were getting back to work. That is the way in which we prevent the objectives from being achieved.

Another objective is that of causing as much economic damage to the United Kingdom as the terrorists can manage. The Bill will ensure that the objective is not achieved. The economic damage may be damage to business premises or shops and jobs. It may be damage that is done to the financial base that underwrites the United Kingdom economy—in particular, the insurance industry. Attached to all that was the attempt to destroy a church in the City and the reaction and response to that. None of the objectives will be achieved.

This Bill, which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State introduced after some of the most able deliberations and consultations with the people most affected and the experts in the field that we have ever had, will go a long way to provide the collective response that we need to ensure that the terrorist objective fails. The measure is right and is welcome. It is right because it is the safety net—it plugs the loopholes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said, the costs will be monitored and regular reports will be made. Reference was made to the fact that we must ensure that fraud is not allowed to creep into the system.

We must stress that the measure is based on the principle that it will in no way assist the uninsured. People may have the impression that we have introduced a measure which will mean that they will not need to bother in the future—the Government will pick up the tab. The hon. Member for Tottenham should tell the minicab driver in his constituency that the Government have not done anything in the measure to discourage him from taking out full comprehensive insurance in the future. I believe that that driver suggested that such insurance might cost £2,000 for a £1,500 car. He should shop around: the only justification for such a premium would be a very bad record and, no doubt, no one with such a record would be driving a minicab. The hon. Gentleman's constituent can be reassured that affordable insurance is available; however, I take the point about compensation for any threat to his livelihood.

It is important not to distort the market and I believe that the Bill goes to great lengths to ensure that that will not happen. It provides a safety net, rather than competition with existing insurance facilities. Some legislation presents us with a temptation to step in, but this Bill does not: although it commits us to ensuring that the risk is underwritten, it will encourage neither high costs nor inefficiency in the system.

The Bill also requires everyone in the community, especially those running businesses, to take sensible precautions against terrorism. Firms in my constituency have expressed concern about structures that could be at risk—gas holders, for instance. We must ensure that such risks are tackled by the managers of the establishments concerned. A home owner does not simply rely on his insurance company to protect him once his home has been burgled; he must also rely on his initiative to make such damage less likely. It is crucial to take such precautions, with police advice.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will clarify three points. When I intervened on the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) on the subject of looting, he responded fairly up to a point; that point involved the protection of an establishment by a security service or firm. Will the payment of insurance following a terrorist act be dependent on such protection, or will the protection be the norm in any event, regardless of whether an act of terrorism has taken place?

My second point concerns the definition of "terrorist", which lawyers doubtless have at their fingertips. Terrorism in London has not always been connected with such bodies as the IRA; London has experienced other forms of anarchistic, violent vandalism. At what point does such action become terrorism and qualify under the Bill?

Thirdly, how will Lloyd's fit in? The way in which companies and their reinsurance companies will join the Pool Reinsurance Company is fairly straightforward, but I am not sure how Lloyd's will do so without undermining the unlimited liability criteria on which it has been judged in the past. Agreement may have been reached and Lloyd's may have taken account of this in its plans for the future; none the less, I believe that the issue should be clarified.

We should pay tribute not only to the Government, but to the British insurance industry. It has taken some knocks; risks have gone wrong and it has had bad publicity from time to time. Ultimately, however, when something goes wrong in our households, businesses or jobs, it is to Lloyd's that we turn and it rarely lets us down. The Bill will ensure that it will not let us down in the event of terrorist acts of violence and vandalism.

Mr. Bell: With the leave of the House, I should like to wind up briefly on behalf of the Opposition.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis) had the benefit of my legal advice earlier. I am happy to say that it was covered by privilege, being given on the Floor of the House, so I am not liable if it turns out to be wrong. I shall, however, leave it to the Minister to give his definition of terrorism as he sees it, and to define the participation of Lloyd's. It would be interesting to know how it can participate, given its syndicate system.

We enjoyed the eloquent speech of the right hon. Member of Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) about the role of the City of London police. We sometimes forget that they are separate from the rest of our police force. They have played a strong and significant role in the face of difficult and serious circumstances.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) demonstrated the unanimity of the House. When the hon. Member for Battersea congratulated the Government, I thought that he would also congratulate the Opposition not only on supporting the Government fully, but on making clear their support beforehand so that hon. Members unable to be present could leave earlier. The hon. Member for Gordon spoke of the Government as the reinsurer of last resort, and of the capital base behind them. It is, of course, money in the bank for anyone whose claim ends up on the desk of the Pool Reinsurance Company and could not be met in any other way.

The hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who declared his interest at an early stage, made an interesting point. He said that he thought that there should be mutual cover for mutual risk, leading to mutual insurance. That was a valid point, which again demonstrated the significant role that insurance can play in the community and the need for all of us to pull together.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) based his speech on personal experience in Northern Ireland. He referred to what one might describe as the excessive publicity which follows terrorist acts. Having examined the press coverage of such events in preparation for the debate, I feel sure that there is excessive publicity. I am reminded of the sinking of an oil tanker off the Shetlands. The television reporter asked someone on the spot, "What is the worst that can happen now?" I think that we spend too much time considering the worst that can happen, rather than the best. Given the means available to the state as the reinsurer of last resort and the flexibility of the insurance market, it is clear that we can respond to the crisis in the market and ensure that businesses continue.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) showed the Opposition a ray of light when he said that it was appropriate to intervene in markets when they failed. Opposition Members will remember that in times to come: every time we call for intervention, we can justify it on the basis of market failure. My hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) made a first-class constituency speech, showing the kind of speech that hon. Members can make on the Floor of the House when they are not inhibited by the Whips and are free to speak on behalf of their constituents. The Whips look up in surprise, but one of the great attributes of today's debate has been the absence of any contribution from them other than benign nodding and an occasional glance at the clock.

By drawing national attention to the plight of his two constituents, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham rendered a significant service not only to them but to the debate and to the standing of the House of Commons. We were also grateful for the contribution of the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), who spoke both as a former Northern Ireland Minister and a Lloyd's name. He brought some extremely helpful knowledge to the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes)—who has devoted a good deal of his parliamentary time to the group known as New Consensus—introduced an extra dimension in relation to what can and what should happen, and spoke of the possible role of Northern Ireland in making Bills such as this unnecessary in future.

The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) made an interesting speech. He, too, is a former Northern Ireland spokesman. He mentioned Mr. Robert Adley. I must tell the House that when I heard of Mr. Adley's death this morning I put on this tie in his honour. He and I shared an interest in ties with the hon. Member for Gosport and other hon. Members, and I think that his wife Jane would be gratified to know that on the day of his death reference has been made to him in the Chamber.

Mr. Viggers: We do not often have an opportunity to pay tribute to an hon. Friend, but I should like to add to the comments made by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell). It was courteous of him to refer to our late colleague Robert Adley, who was held in great affection in the House.

Mr. Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those remarks.

I think that I have covered the issues raised, and I have one or two points to put to the Minister. It has been stated that the legislation is retrospective. The question is whether the Bill is genuinely retrospective. I am satisfied that it is, and that when enacted it will be retrospective. The Minister may wish to clarify that. There is consensus in the House on the measure.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. I congratulate all hon. Members who have participated—our proceedings have revealed a remarkable and rare unanimity among us.

In the debate, I have been accused of introducing interventionism. It just goes to show what a wet left-winger like myself, when introduced to the Department of Trade and Industry, can do to effect changes in Government policy. As I said in my opening speech, such interventionism is designed to correct a market failure where the national interest requires it.

I have never been an anarchist who does not believe in any Government intervention. I have always believed that the national interest should be safeguarded by the Government, but I have taken a different view of the national interest from that of, for example, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes). It is a sign of the unanimity in the House that the hon. Gentleman, from one wing of the Labour party, and myself, from the opposite extreme of the political spectrum in the Conservative party, were able to unite in support of the Bill.

[Mr. Neil Hamilton]

I accept the correction of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), for whom I have the highest respect, when he referred to my mention of the infinitesimal chances of the IRA or any terrorist group succeeding in compelling the British Government to change policy as a result of acts of violence. He said that the correct word should be "non-existent", and I certainly accept his correction, although "infinitesimal" means so small as not to be perceived.

I certainly agree that we in this country can never allow Government policy to be dictated by acts of violence. We may have to respond to acts of violence with measures such as the Bill, but the achievement of the political objectives that inspire the violence will never be conceded by Her Majesty's Government, whatever their political complexion. To do so would be to subvert the basis of democratic society and institutions of democracy such as the House.

We should allow ourselves some general reflections on the Bill's purpose. My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) was right to say that we should all become more vigilant. There have been some recent terrorist apprehensions by the police. I certainly agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) that the City police, the Westminster police and the Metropolitan police deserve the highest praise for the way in which they handled the consequences of the bombs in the City and elsewhere in the capital.

As a consequence of increased public vigilance, we have been able to apprehend terrorist suspects, and we hope that those responsible for all the acts of violence will be apprehended. Through our vigilance, we can all participate in the national interest.

My constituency borders the borough of Warrington. Bronwen Vickers, whose leg had to be amputated as a result of the explosion in Warrington, is one of my constituents. The effects of terrorist violence have been felt in the north-west of England, which is close to home for me. It must be the united desire of everyone in the House to remain vigilant and to help to defeat the current terrorist outbreak that is causing so much hurt.

I agree with the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), who paid me a surprising compliment by commenting on the moderation that I have displayed during the debate: we would play into the hands of terrorists if we exaggerated the consequences of violence. I believe, and always have done, that the best response is to be resigned but determined.

We must be determined not to be deflected from our political objectives and to say, "Try as you might, and although it may hurt us or cost us money, we shall then bear the cost that you impose on us and redouble our efforts to preserve the essence of our democratic system free from the taint of violence." We shall respond by the counter-measures that we take—not only by policing, but by introducing measures such as the Bill—in order to neutralise, and more than neutralise, the effects of the violence used in an attempt to defeat the democratic process.

I have been asked a number of technical questions, and I shall try to respond to as many as possible. I know that there is considerable interest in the next debate, so I shall not delay the House too long. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) mentioned the Bill's retrospective application. The Bill is drafted to apply to contracts of insurance entered into from 1 January. That date does not appear in the Bill, but that general power is contained in the Bill, and it has been made plain during the debate that it will apply to contracts of insurance from 1 January.

The sums of money that the Government ultimately may have to be paid will be identified in a separate vote within the Department of Trade and Industry's votes. Any accruals that may fall due will appear in the appropriation accounts. There will be opportunities in Parliament during the year to debate the way in which the scheme has worked. There will doubtless be other general debates as well.

I cannot commit the Leader of the House or the business managers, as I am now inhibited and no longer an inhibitor as a member of the Whips Office. Therefore, I cannot say to what extent we shall be able to debate matters related to the Bill once it is enacted, as I hope it will be. I am sure that there will be many opportunities for us to discuss the Bill's general principles and the way in which it has worked in practice.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield also asked about the costs of the recent explosion at Bishopsgate. I return to the remarks of the hon. Member for Upper Bann, who deplored the knee-jerk reactions, scaremongering and exaggerations of the instant pundits that were so gleefully reported by the press. I think that people, particularly those who work in the City of London and the insurance industry, should know better than to respond with the comments that we heard in the immediate aftermath of the explosions, both at St. Mary Axe and at Bishopsgate.

As was proved in the case of St. Mary Axe, the pundits were talking through their hats and did nothing but damage to the cause we are debating. They gave nothing but help to the IRA by their intemperate and ignorant comments. If there is another explosion, I hope that the instant pundits will curb their desire for a brief moment of publicity and say nothing until they know what they are talking about.

As for the cost of the Bishopsgate explosion, I am not in a position to give an accurate figure, because too many uncertainties still surround it. It is not yet certain how much work has to be done on some of the buildings, so we do not know how much the work will cost. We do not know how much of the damage was insured against terrorist risk. Some insurance policies hang over from last year and include terrorist cover. They will not expire until later this year. So many buildings that may have suffered as a result of the attack may already be covered by contracts of insurance. We therefore will not know the total cost for many months.

It is not yet certain how much of what has been insured will fall within the current arrangements, so we do not know to what extent Pool Reinsurance will be called on to pay out. Finally, it is not yet certain how high the income of Pool will be this year, so we cannot at this stage predict what calls on the Government there may be.

Although this may not be regarded as an informative response, it at least has the merit of accuracy—unlike some of the specific figures given by people for previous explosions, figures that were subsequently found to be utterly misleading. It would be wrong to adopt that approach.

The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant), in an excellent speech on behalf of his constituents, drew attention to the bravery of certain drivers and to their speed of thought. I share the regret expressed by other hon. Members about their loss, but I reiterate that the scheme is an insurance scheme. I cannot guarantee a solution to the sort of problem that the hon. Gentleman discussed. It depends on the degree of take-up as a result of the operation of the scheme.

I welcome other measures that are being taken, especially the establishment of a trust fund, from which I hope the losses sustained by public-spirited individuals such as the constituents of the hon. Member for Tottenham will be paid. I hope that people will contribute generously.

I have asked the insurance industry to ensure that third party, fire and theft policies always cover loss due to terrorism and explosions of this kind. There is no reason why such cover should be excluded; after all, the reason why we are debating the Bill is that, in the past, insurance companies did not consider the liability to which they might be exposed from terrorist explosions, because they were not a problem of which we had any great experience.

I fully accept the point made by the hon. Member for Upper Bann in support of the hon. Member for Tottenham—that there is a lacuna here; but it is not best plugged by Government compensation. The arrangement for Great Britain will be sufficient for our needs. The situation here is rather different from that in Northern Ireland, and we do not necessarily need a comprehensive scheme crafted in the same way to cover the whole country.

Unless I can be persuaded by some compelling argument to extend the scheme from Northern Ireland to Great Britain—no one has succeeded in persuading me yet, not even the eloquent hon. Member for Upper Bann —we will not adopt the scheme for Northern Ireland here. I cannot speak for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The attractions or otherwise of what I am introducing for Great Britain to the Northern Ireland Office and to Northern Ireland are a matter to take up with him. I am sure that the hon. Member for Upper Bann will receive the usual convincing response from my right hon. and learned Friend.

I will be happy to respond by letter to points that I have not been able to deal with this evening. I refer particularly to the small but important points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). Meanwhile, I hope that the spirit of amity in which this matter has been debated this evening will survive. If we ever suffer a repetition of the appalling terrorist incidents of recent times, I hope that they will serve not to divide us, but to strengthen the unity that has been so amply demonstrated this evening.

I thank all hon. Members who have taken part, especially the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, who speaks with such authority for the Labour party on these matters. I thank hon. Members for assisting the quick passage of the Bill through the House, because people outside expect the Government to respond quickly in emergencies such as this.

I believe that the combination of swift action and measured response which this Bill represents is legislation and Government action at its best. Government action with the support of both sides of the House is all too rarely found in our political system or, indeed, in political systems anywhere in the world. That is to the credit of all, and it should be a further demonstration to the IRA that its cause will never win.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills), That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

Question agreed to.

Further proceedings on the Bill stood postponed, pursuant to Order [7 May.]

REINSURANCE (ACTS OF TERRORISM) BILL

[Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(a) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of such sums as may be necessary to enable the Secretary of State to meet such obligations of his as are mentioned in the Act;

(b) the payment of any sums into the Consolidated Fund—[Mr. Robert G. Hughes.]

8.16 pm

Mr. Bell: The Bill comes before the House as a result of the shortage of capacity in the worldwide reinsurance market and because of the fact that certain European reinsurance companies withdrew their support from our insurance market. It is therefore less to do with terrorism than with insurance.

Under clause 1, the power of the state comes in behind the insurance market and stands four square behind the market of the City of London. We welcome that.

Under clause 2, the Treasury will undertake any liability that may flow from the Bill. We welcome the involvement of the Treasury. We see that a mutual company is to be created, and we welcome that idea and urge all reinsurance companies in the country fully to involve themselves.

We see that the DTI will have certain responsibilities —two posts will be required. We know that the Department is responsible for oversight of our insurance market, so we welcome that aspect of the Bill too.

We commend the Third Reading of the Bill——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Perhaps I should let the hon. Gentleman know that we are discussing the money resolution, not Third Reading—although they may be virtually indistinguishable.

Mr. Bell: Since they are virtually indistinguishable, I shall leave my comments at that.

Question put and agreed to.

The House, pursuant to Order [7 May], immediately resolved itself into a Committee on the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Mr. Bell: Having ensured that the money resolution and Third Reading are not mutually exclusive in lawyers' terms, I shall not repeat my earlier remarks. I shall say only that the final message from the Opposition, which is similar to that from the Government, is that there is no future in terrorism, destruction and death. No political solutions are on offer. The message to the IRA, or any other terrorist organisation, is that it is not worth it—it is not worth a bean. I hope that that message comes over clearly.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Automated Credit Transfers

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert. G. Hughes.]

8.20 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I am grateful that Madam Speaker has chosen this subject for debate, because her choice recognises the social and economic importance of the effect of automated credit transfer upon rural sub-post offices nationwide. There have been six early-day motions on the subject over the past few months, attracting at least 200 signatures at the last count. It has been the subject of written and oral questions, including two in Prime Minister's Question Time, and a debate in the other place. There will be a debate on the subject, in Opposition time, next week.

Despite all the attention, the issue has not been resolved, nor have key aspects of it been made clearer. The issue is important, first and foremost, for the impact that it could have on the millions of pensioners who use their post office on a weekly basis to cash their pensions and benefits. For most pensioners, that weekly visit to the post office is the most convenient and desirable way to receive their benefits. It has many merits for them. It gives them an opportunity to catch up on news and gossip, and to find out what is happening in the local community and to friends and neighbours.

That visit is also an opportunity to gather from the postmasters and postmistresses other information that may be useful and beneficial to them. The individuals who work behind the counters are, as most hon. Members—certainly all who represent rural constituencies—will recognise, people who are made enormously knowledgeable by the very nature of their work, combining as they do the functions of Government clerk, small shopkeeper and occasional social worker.

Perhaps I may be permitted to quote a postmistress in my local village of Garrabost, Mrs. Joan Anne Campbell. Speaking to the local newspaper, the Stornoway Gazette, Mrs. Campbell said:

> "Your local post office is more than just that—it is a public service. It is a place to get forms filled in, a place to meet and have a chat and, sometimes for those behind the counter, it's almost like being a social worker. A local sub-post officer is really the centre-point of a community and has a very important part to play."

That may have been said by someone working in a local post office in the Western Isles, but it will be recognised as valid and true throughout the rural areas of Britain.

Unlike banks, sub-post offices are easily accessible to the vast majority of elderly people who use them. As is not the case with banks, there are sub-post offices in the majority of villages throughout Great Britain. I have been quoted the figure of 60 per cent. of villages having a sub-post office. Those who run post offices are familiar with, and familiar to, their elderly customers. They provide a point of reassurance for the pensioners who use them. The Government should see them as an invaluable asset, rather than as an encumbrance or a drain on money that they have to stop.

The non-appearance one week of a pensioner who usually uses the post office will immediately be noticed by the local sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress. If a pensioner appears but looks a bit peaky, that will be noticed and observed. That kind of contact, that kind of relationship between people, is unique to the post office network of Great Britain. It could not be duplicated by the banking service.

The system is not an archaic hangover, a traditional aspect of British national life that is best done away with. On the contrary, with the advent of care in the community, the social role of sub-post offices as dispensers of advice and services, as well as of pensions and benefits, ought to be enhanced, not diminished. If they had not had that network of 20,000 post offices and sub-post offices, the Government would have had to invent it when they came to implement care in the community.

It is a foolish economy for the Government to be considering closing rural sub-post offices, whatever the purported savings of a switch to automated credit transfer. What savings there will be may be at the financial expense of the pensioners, because of the charges that may be deducted by the banks or the loss of interest on delayed payments, which may be retained by the Government.

If the move goes ahead, it will be greatly to the detriment of pensioners, who will be much inconvenienced. The switch to ACT will mean that pensioners will lose the right to receive their pensions on a weekly basis. Payments will be made monthly in arrears. That may be convenient and financially attractive for the Government, but I cannot for a moment believe that it will be convenient for the pensioners. Many pensioners—perhaps even a majority of them—are relatively well off, but many live a hand-to-mouth existence. For them, it is impossible to conceive of budgeting other than on a weekly basis. It would make their lives still more difficult to have to be constantly a month in arrears because of the switch to ACT.

Pensioners also need to have cash ready to hand to buy the little odds and ends that they need on a day-to-day basis—groceries, newspapers and so on. Where can they obtain that ready cash if the Government go ahead and succeed in switching benefits to direct payments into banks? Pensioners will often have to cope with the fact that there will be no bank in their locality, and they will have to travel many miles to go into town to withdraw money for the week or the fortnight, on buses or even by hiring a taxi if the bus network is not there or the service is not convenient. That will be enormously inconvenient and troubling to many pensioners.

We must also bear in mind the fact that pensioners will have to visit the bank in person to draw money, whereas someone who is elderly, who is ill that week, or who is partially sighted or disabled, can send a representative to the local post office to pick up his or her pension. With banks that is not possible.

I have already mentioned the invaluable social role of the rural post office, and there is no doubt that the sub-post office network will be badly hit by the loss of the business that pensions and benefits represent. Inevitably, many will close as a direct consequence of the switch to the payment of pensions and benefits by automated transfer into bank accounts. Almost 13 million people visit their local post office each week to pick up their pensions, and that business from the Department of Social Security represents one third of the turnover of Post Office Counters Ltd. That is a greater proportion of business than comes from the Royal Mail, which represents only one fifth of the total turnover. Of that enormous benefits turnover, about 18 per cent. is drawn through sub-post offices.

Clearly the loss of the pensions and benefits business will have a direct impact on the viability of local sub-post offices. Moreover, the loss of that business will cause the loss of other business, on which sub-post offices rely to make them financially viable. We must remember that post offices are often shops as well, and that the people who come in to pick up their pensions also stop to buy newspapers, groceries, stationery and a variety of other goods.

If those people did not come in to pick up their pensions and benefits, they would not buy the groceries and newspapers either, and the loss of that secondary business would be a massive blow to rural sub-post offices. If offices had to close because the loss of that business meant that they were no longer viable, many villages would lose not only their post office but their only shop. That would be a severe blow to many villages.

The Government talk about offering their customers choice. However, if local sub-post offices close many people who would have wished to exercise that choice will be denied the opportunity to do so. They will be forced against their will to use automated credit transfer. The Government must take on board the fact that the exercise of choice by a minority, by making the sub-post office network no longer viable, could have a knock-on effect on the majority of people and in effect remove the choice that they would have exercised if the post offices in their communities had still been open.

There is another point to make about consumer choice. If the Government were merely offering information to pensioners about the existence of automated credit transfer, there would be little objection from either side of the House. The Government already provide the option of automated credit transfer, and there can be little objection to making that option widely known to pensioners and to others who might want to choose it, so long as the choice is offered in a neutral and even-handed way. But clearly, that is not happening.

Both the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), have made it clear that the Government are actively encouraging pensioners to switch to automated credit transfer. On 12 March this year, the Under-Secretary said:

"Our policy is to encourage the use of automated credit transfer".—[Official Report, 12 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 751.]

In other words, the Government are not neutral or even-handed; they are peddling a particular option for their own self-interested reasons.

That fact is borne out by a trial of three new forms being sent to 24,000 people who are due to receive their pensions for the first time. The forms are designed to tell the pensioners what pension they are entitled to and how they may collect it. I have obtained copies of the forms, and each one of the three types is being sent out to a sample of 8,000 new pensioners. The first form is the most even-handed, because there is a section, part 9, headed:

"How you want to be paid—you can choose".

That is fair enough. The form lists two options, the first of which is:

"Straight into a bank account or building society account".

Then various details are given about that option.

The second option is described as:

"By order book—at a post office".

Slightly fewer details are then given about that option. Later in the form, there are two sections for pensioners to fill in, one of which will provide for payment of the pension straight into a bank or building society account, and the other of which will provide payment by order book at a post office. The pensioner can choose simply by filling in the form and sending it off.

That form provides the pensioner with a clear choice, although there could be objections about the way in which the two choices are described, because the first choice—payment straight into a bank or building society account—is accompanied by a list of its advantages, such as the fact that interest can be gathered on the money paid into such accounts. We might think that it was a bit disingenuous of the Government not to mention that they will be gathering interest from the money that they pay out, not weekly, but monthly in arrears. But we can leave that point to one side.

We might also complain that the option of the order book is described, but does not have any corresponding list of advantages appended. Nevertheless, there is enough information there for the pensioner to make a fairly clear, well-informed choice between the two options.

The second form, however, falls well short of offering the pensioner a clear choice between the two options that are available. In the equivalent part 9 of that form it says again,

"How do you want to be paid? You can choose."

However, it does not give two options. It starts by listing

"Straight into a bank account or a building society account."

Then it gives the same list of advantages and procedures.

At the bottom of the form it says simply:

"If you want any more information, get in touch with your Social Security office."

There is no mention whatsoever of the post office option.

Also at the bottom of the form there is provision for a form to be filled in by the pensioner in order to get the pension paid straight into a bank or building society account. It then, finally, mentions payment by order book at a post office and asks the question:

"Do you want to be paid by order book at a post office?"

It does not mention any advantages or give any details. There are simply two boxes, one to be ticked for "no" and one to be ticked for "yes", and it says:

"We will write to you about this."

So hardly any information is made available to the pensioner. The pensioner has to tick a box and send the form off, and the DSS will send the pensioner further information about the post office option.

That form is bad enough, but the third form that is being tested with 8,000 pensioners is even worse. It is similar to the other forms. It has a section headed:

"How you want to be paid", and, as in the second form, the option of having the pension paid straight into a bank or building society account is described in great detail. All the supposed advantages are listed, but again there is no mention of the post office option. It simply says at the bottom of the form that if the pensioner wants any more information he or she should get in touch with the social security office.

At the bottom of the coupon that has to be filled in by the pensioner in order to take advantage of the option of having the pension paid straight into a bank or building society account there are the words:

"Do you want to be paid by other means?"

It does not say whether those other means are through the post office or any other way. There are again two boxes, one to be ticked for "no" and the other for "yes", followed by the words:

"We will write to you about this."

So the first of these forms points out the advantages of using automated transfer and describes to some extent the option of using a post office. The second form gives information only about banks and building societies; it mentions post offices, but gives no information whatsoever about that option. The third form does not even mention the fact that there is a post office option; it simply says that there are other options available.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Lord Henley, made what I regard as a pretty astounding and breathtaking statement about these forms in the other place. He said:

"The simple aim behind what we are doing is to test the effect of each of those forms."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 17 March 1993; Vol. 543, c. 1544.]

It would not take an Einstein to figure out the effect of these forms. Obviously, the more automated transfer is talked of, and the less the post office is mentioned, the more the pensioners will opt for the former. That will clearly be the effect of these three forms.

This is really a dodgy way to go about informing pensioners of their rights and options in receiving their pensions. Surely the Government should be trying to make their forms for pensioners more, rather than less, helpful.

I expect that the Minister is a fervent exponent of the citizens charter, and I ask him how it is consistent with that charter deliberately to withhold information from pensioners, DSS customers, as the last two forms do. I believe that the Government have no right to be steering and manipulating pensioners in this way. They should be offering genuine choice to pensioners, not a fake version of it.

I am looking for two things from the Minister, on behalf of the Government, when he replies. The first is a retraction of the Government's statement that it is their intention to encourage pensioners to use automated transfer. I want the Minister to be able to say on behalf of the Government that pensioners will be given genuine freedom of choice in this matter, without constraint or manipulation of any kind. The second is to ask his colleagues in the DSS to give a commitment that these trial forms will be shredded and thrown away, and new ones produced—forms that will provide proper comprehensive, unbiased information for pensioners.

The 20,000 post offices and sub-post offices of Britain are not just local centres of community life; they are also, I believe, a manifestation and a symbol in each town and village of Britain, whether in the Western Isles or Tunbridge Wells, of the wider national community, the country to which we all belong. A genuinely Conservative Government would have as one of its foremost priorities the preservation and enhancement of these symbols, these centres, of our national life.

But this Administration is not, of course, Conservative in that traditional and worthy sense. This is an Administration of libertarian dogmatists and cheeseparing accountants, who know the price of everything and the value of nothing. I fear that rural post offices are intended to be the latest in the long roll call of their victims.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Before we continue, I remind hon. Members that an Adjournment debate normally lasts only half an hour. It is understood that only the hon. Member raising the subject and the Minister may speak unless both grant their permission to other hon. Members. I know that the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) has allowed one hon. Member to come into the debate. I am sure that neither he nor the Minister will mind if others come in. Nevertheless, I believe that we should maintain the tradition.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton): I thank and congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on choosing this subject for the Adjournment debate. Before the general election, there was much talk about a double whammy. I do not know whether the wording of the advertisement was correct, or whether it had the intended impact. It certainly created a great deal of confusion. On this issue, there is a genuine double threat which pensioners have rightly picked up. I have had more letters in my postbag this past fortnight about the threat to post offices than I have had during the whole of the Maastricht debate, which trundled on here for a considerable time. This is a tremendously important issue. I am a little dismayed by the fact that the Government must have realised the fear that was felt by pensioners about the threat to their post offices and the threat to their ability to draw at post offices the benefits to which they were entitled.

My hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles mentioned post offices in rural areas. My constituency has a fairly extensive rural area and the post offices there are as my hon. Friend describes. In the urban areas, sub-post offices are also centres of the communities in which they are located. I am sure that many hon. Members have gone past post offices on pension day. One certainly knows which day is pension day when one passes a sub-post office. The pensioners have a ritual of queueing there fairly early. I do not know whether it is because they think that the Government will cause a run on the pound. Sub-post offices are an important and integral part of most communities, whether urban or rural.

It is not only pensioners who go to sub-post offices. If sub-post offices are forced to close because of a lack of business in terms of benefits being paid out, there is no other place within the immediate area where people can get television licence stamps, television licences or saving stamps, and there is no other place where they can pay their water rates or their council tax bills. The sub-post office outlet is an important part of our communities.

Most of the pensioners to whom I have spoken and most of the letters that I have received from pensioners say that they do not want pensions to be paid into banks or into building societies by automated credit transfer—ACT. They want to retain the right to go to the post offices to draw their pensions, or, if they cannot draw their pensions themselves, to be able to have their families or nominated people to draw the pensions there for them.

The majority of pensioners do not have bank accounts or building society accounts, but that is not the only point. As a result of the banks' meanness in many respects, the fear has crept in that once pensioners are trapped into having their pensions paid into those establishments, they will start charging pensioners for the transactions into and out of the accounts. If money is paid into the account, it must come out of the account at some time. I understand that banks are looking closely at their charges to customers.

There is the twin fear about the monthly payment, which has been much mooted as a replacement for the weekly payment. Monthly payments are wrong in two respects. First, they will be paid in arrears. Pensioners already struggle in many respects. How on earth can they be expected to live for three weeks without a pension? It may be nice for people on large salaries to receive payments in arrears, but it is not good for people on low incomes, such as pensioners. Secondly, monthly payments will accelerate the closure of sub-post offices. Instead of a sub-post office doing four transactions a month, it will do only one. The position of sub-post offices is based on their throughput. If the throughput is on a monthly basis, it will obviously be very much reduced.

Sub-post offices are in communities, they serve communities and they are very much at the heart of communities. It would be a terrible loss to communities if they were closed. I should like the Minister to remove some of the fear that pensioners genuinely feel: that they are being thrust into the option of having their pensions paid by direct payment or paid monthly. That fear is being transmitted to pensioners who fear that their sub-post offices will be lost. I should like the Minister to give an assurance that no Government action will bring that about.

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): Like the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner), I congratulate the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on succeeding in having this Adjournment debate tonight, which is important and most timely. I thank him not only for allowing me to take part in the debate, but for inviting me to take part in it. In his letter of invitation, he said that there was a significant point that we should all make and that it was important that it had cross-party support. I am delighted that he has been so generous and I thank him very much.

Although it may be true that technically I was the first to raise the matter in the House when I raised it last Thursday at Prime Minister's Question Time, I readily concede that the hon. Member for Western Isles must have applied for the debate before I put my question. Technically, I was the first, but I concede that he was the first in mental attitude, and I gladly make that point.

The hon. Member for Western Isles spent some time going through the forms which many of us have. I am glad that he did so, because there is little doubt that the forms are an attempt to encourage pensioners and others on benefits to use banks and building societies rather than the post offices. I have no wish to stop anyone using a bank or a building society if that is what they wish to do. I am sure that the hon. Members for Western Isles and for Nuneaton agree with that. That is all right if it is people's free choice and if they are not being led by the nose in another direction. One can imagine that for people who are a long way from a post office and for people who pay most of their bills by cheque, it might be an advantage for the pension to be paid into a bank and to be used to settle their bills by cheque. It could be a positive advantage for people who are housebound. But to lead the beneficiaries of payment to believe that there is only one major choice, a bank or a building society, is quite wrong.

I will not repeat what the hon. Member for Western Isles said about the forms—he went through them comprehensively. I just add one point. On the third form, the post office is not mentioned. At the bottom it says "By other means". At the top of the form, and on the other forms, when they want the pensioner or the person collecting benefit to use a bank or building society, the bank or buildingc society comes first in the hope that the pensioner will tick that first. On the third form there are two blocks. One is

"How often do you want your Retirement Pension paid? Every four weeks? Every 13 weeks?"

We know that most people want it every four weeks, so that comes first and every 13 weeks comes second, because it is the option that is less likely to be used. But when it comes to the bottom, if one can find the post office on the second form that the hon. Member for Western Isles referred to, what is the first question?

"Do you want to be paid by order book at a post office? No, Yes."

It is not very often in English that we suggest the answer in this form. It is usually "Yes or No". It is the same on the third form:

"Do you want to be paid by other means? No, Yes."

It is a rather strange use of English and it is attempting to lead in a certain direction.

If people want the money paid into the bank, there is little doubt that sooner or later they finish up with bank charges. Even if a charge is not made for collecting benefit, we all become overdrawn from time to time. Once that happens, the charges escalate out of all proportion. It will happen to people who are least able to pay bank charges.

The idea that people should be paid benefits three weeks in arrears is no inducement to having benefits paid into a bank or building society. Perhaps somewhere on the form it should say,

"If you do choose a bank or building society, you understand, do you not, that for the first month you will receive nothing at all? Now, do you want it paid into a bank or building society or would you like it paid by other means?"

But I do not see that anywhere on the form, which is less than completely honest and open.

There is another consideration. If anyone should choose payment into a bank or building society, it is possible that the account will be a joint one. Money will then be paid into an account over which the beneficiary does not have total control. This is particularly significant when it comes to child benefit. The whole philosophy behind child benefit as promulgated by the Department of Social Security is that it should be targeted on the mothers. In many cases it goes straight into the mother's purse and into the housekeeping for looking after children without the father having anything to do with it. That is essential in some instances, for reasons that we all know about, but if this benefit were paid into a joint bank account mothers would lose control of money that is meant to help them look after their children.

There have been several references to the fact that the forms seem designed to lead people to choose banks or building societies. That is the whole presumption. But it is not a true choice. The choice is there if one looks very hard for it. It is there in the first form; it is there, if one looks hard for it, in the second form; but in the third form one could be excused for thinking that there is no choice at all and, even if there is one, it is extremely well hidden. The Conservative party prides itself on offering choice, but in this regard we are not following the philosophy and manifesto of our own party.

We have heard that the post office network has 20,000 branches, but how many people realise that there are more post office branches than there are branches of the four major banks and the six major building societies combined? It is a marvellous network and an asset to the whole country, whether we live in the Western Isles, John o'Groats or Land's End. In those post offices, 40 per cent. of the business comes from the benefits and 50 per cent. of customers are there to collect the pensions or benefits. There is little doubt that if those receiving pensions and benefits are forced to have them paid into banks and building societies, the post offices will lose 40 per cent. of their business and 50 per cent. of their customers. That will undoubtedly lead to the closure of some post offices. I can see no alternative.

I do not suggest to the Minister that he removes the possibility of people having their benefit paid into a bank or building society—far from it, because I believe in choice —but the choice should be free and open, not guided.

A very strong campaign is going on at present and most hon. Members will have seen the leaflet put out by the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. The campaign is slightly exaggerated, but I do not criticise it for that because any campaign worth its salt will be slightly exaggerated. One exaggerates to make a point and sometimes campaigns that are too modest fail to make their point at all.

I do not complain about the slight exaggeration, but I am concerned that, as a result of the campaign, many elderly, infirm and sick people are now worried sick that, in future, they will be unable to collect their pension in the normal way. The sooner we squash that anxiety and a categorical statement is issued from the Government to say that choice will remain, the sooner we can put at ease the anxieties and fears of many of our senior citizens in constituencies up and down and east and west of the country.

To deny choice will remove business from post offices and that will result in closures. Closures would, in due course, eliminate any choice for those who are in most need of it.

9.5 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Hon. Members are extremely grateful to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) not only for choosing to debate this issue on such a timely occasion, but for his foresight in doing so on an evening when we have the time to do it justice. I am also grateful to him for allowing me to intervene briefly in the debate. I hope not to cover those matters which have already been mentioned.

I agree with the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), but I take issue with him on one small factual point, because this is not a problem that has just been mentioned in the House in the past few days. My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and I were in the House some months ago before Christmas at 5.30 in the morning to discuss it. You, too, were present, Madam Deputy Speaker, and you were, as always, wide awake while some of us were feeling rather sleepy.

My hon. Friend and I had looked forward in that debate because my hon. Friend had already received some answers from the Department that suggested that the Government were to pursue precisely the experiment that is now before us. We have now learnt the lesson to look at such proposals with a jaundiced eye. My hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) also raised this subject with the Prime Minister this afternoon.

We all agree that this is a matter of all-party concern. I am also pleased, as I am sure you are, Madam Deputy Speaker, that at least one Member representing the south-west is here to ensure that the concern felt in the Western Isles is reflected from the other end of the country. This matter concerns all of us who represent rural constituencies.

The concern that has already been made clear by other hon. Members is that, if discrimination and pressure are to be exerted, this proposal is a step in the wrong direction. If we are to have positive discrimination, it should be towards the essential, public social service that is provided by the sub-post office network.

The difference in attitude between the service that pensioners and other beneficiaries receive from sub-post offices and that which they could expect to receive from a bank or building society was revealed by the experience of one of my constituents. She had an occupational pension and, for reasons best known to her former employer, it was decided that it should be paid by ACT into a bank account. My constituent opened an account specifically for that purpose. Because she could not always get to the bank because of the distance involved and ill health, she made arrangements for someone to go there and cash a cheque on a weekly basis on her behalf.

My constituent found, however, that because the calculations were based on the 52 weeks of the year, the amount from the pension was never exactly the same to the nearest penny each week. That meant that when one cheque was presented for cashing and the sum was paid, she was 1p overdrawn. She then discovered that she was subject to bank charges. It is that difference in attitude between the traditional support and services that the sub-post office network has given and that offered by the only alternative, the banks and building societies, which is causing us so much concern.

Some 10 per cent. of sub-post offices have disappeared from the network in the past decade, and the proposal that the Department is apparently pursuing would turn that trickle into a veritable stream.

Hon. Members have said that about 40 per cent. of sub-post office turnover is for benefits of various sorts. In some parts of the country, notably rural areas with high levels of unemployment and perhaps above average numbers of retired people, it reaches 55 or even 60 per cent. of turnover. So the discrimination against rural areas, which can least afford the change, will be that much stronger.

In conjunction with the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, my Liberal Democrat colleagues in the south-west and I have undertaken a number of surveys of the impact of the changes on the sub-post office network. It is clear from our work that upwards of 50 per cent. of village sub-post offices—we recognise that the same situation may not apply in the suburbs or more central areas—would be at risk if the proposals became so persuasive that large numbers of people switched to ACT.

In those circumstances, the domino effect to which hon. Members have referred would become dramatic. There would, first, be the removal of a slice of benefits. That would be followed by the sub-post office being reduced to community hours, because the number of units would not justify the full number of hours. That would make it less convenient for people in the local community. Finally, because the sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress found that it was not viable, not commercial, not worth the effort and perhaps not worth training or keeping staff for that purpose, the post office would go.

Of those in that category in Cornwall, 45 per cent. have the only village store alongside, in the same building and as part of the same business. So the removal of post office business puts at risk the only general store in the village. I can speak only from experience in the south-west, but in those circumstances, almost invariably the store will go, not only because of the reduction in turnover as the result of the removal of post office business itself but because if people are not drawing their cash over the counter at one side of the building they will not be spending it on the other side. So the store goes.

In Cornwall in those circumstances, the nearest general store will be, on average, two miles away. The people of whom we are speaking tonight, bearing in mind the limited access to public transort these days, and with only limited access to private transport, will be badly cut off. I recently received a letter from a gentleman who was being persuaded to switch his Government occupational pension to a bank account. He explained that to get to his nearest bank would mean a £15 return taxi fare, which would remove a fair slice from any money that he received. The average distance in Cornwall from some villages to the nearest bank branch is more than 10 miles.

I hope that we shall hear from the Minister tonight not just that the Department will take seriously the criticisms that hon. Members in all parts of the House have made, but that they are prepared to open a dialogue again wth the Post Office. In recent days, Bill Cockburn, the Post Office's chief executive, has drawn attention to the fact that about 5,000 rural post offices are at stake as a result of the proposals and that many thousands of people would be affected by their closure. He said:

"If such a thing were to happen, the entire network of post offices would be on the line".

He put forward a practical, sensible, up-to-date and modern suggestion. He said that the Post Office should work with the Department to develop a high-tech solution in the form of plastic cards which would, he claimed, enable customers to have their payments swiftly dealt with without difficulty through terminals in sub-post offices and with electronic links to the Department. He pointed out:

"A third of the PO's income is generated by DSS payments at 20,000 outlets."

I do not intend to repeat points that have already been made, but for the benefit of all concerned—sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses, pensioners and all those who live in remote areas or in any village that could be affected—we need a clear statement. I hope that the Minister's reply will offer opportunities for dialogue with the management of the Post Office and reassurance for all those who would be affected by a switch to ACT.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

I hope, too, that the statement will show clearly that the Department and the Government recognise the value of a national network of post office outlets. As the hon. Member for Rochford said, it is unique to this country and is widely appreciated. If the Minister and the Department are able to do that, I am sure that it will be welcomed in all parts of the House. This, I hope, is the last that we shall hear of this preposterous proposition.

9.15 pm

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I, too, am grateful to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) for initiating this Adjournment debate. As the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) said, we have heard the voice of the north and the south. The Ordnance Survey map shows that the Ribble valley is in the centre of the United Kingdom, so we are covering almost every part of the country in the debate.

My constituency is extremely rural and contains many rural post offices. In some villages, the post office is the only shop. It would be absolutely insane of me to say that post offices should be allowed to survive on their own. Some of them would be unable to do so. Nevertheless, we have to wake up to the reality that many of our rural post offices were under attack well before the introduction of automated credit transfers.

The opening hours of some village post offices in my constituency have been greatly reduced over the years. The hours have been so contracted in one rural post office that one wonders whether it is worth its remaining open. In another village, the post office operates from a pub. It is in Pendleton. The pub is the "Swan with Two Necks". Customers have to go to the pub for their postal requirements. That is an imaginative compromise.

We may have to look at innovative ideas so that new life may be breathed into our post offices to ensure that they survive. Some people may prefer ACT instead of having to go to the post office every few weeks. Given the choice, many pensioners may start to drift away from the post office. We must take a realistic look, therefore, at how we are to breathe new life into rural post offices and village stores. Some post offices sell other goods. The turnover of some of them is low and the profits marginal. They work right on the edge between profitability and loss.

Stamps can now be bought in virtually any shop. That was not the case 15 or so years ago. Stamps could be obtained only from the post office and between certain hours, which was nonsense. Nobody would argue today that stamps ought to be sold only by post offices.

If we are to attempt to breathe new life into post offices, we ought to consider freeing up post offices so that they can become agencies for banks and building societies. In some small towns and villages, banks and building societies are closing. A building society branch has recently closed in one village in my constituency.

We should also look at beefing up the Giro bank so that those pensioners who decide that they wish to take their pensions via ACT can do so easily through post offices. The hon. Member for North Cornwall suggested that we should also consider the use of hi-tech in post offices so that they are able to retain their customers.

Fraud related to pensions and social security payments is running at £100 million a year, and the current administration costs amount to £400 million, so it is clear that something must be done. At the same time, I support the general thrust of the idea that pensioners must be given a choice. Those who want to have their pensions paid by the traditional method are entitled to that facility. However, fresh and lively ideas must be considered so that post offices in outlying regions may be given a new lease of life well into the next century.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend on bringing this matter before the House. Many hon. Members, from all parties and from many parts of the country, have been given an opportunity to express their concern—concern which has been expressed also in the very many letters that hon. Members, including myself, have received. The constituency that I represent includes urban and rural areas. Of course, this debate is about the rural aspect of the problem, and because its communities are scattered the Western Isles area is very vulnerable. But even in urban areas, many small and distinct communities, such as Riddings in the borough of Scunthorpe, are very concerned about the future of their post offices.

If we encourage measures as a result of which people do not have a clear choice, many post offices will no longer be viable. Indeed, many rural offices are under considerable threat already. I recently had an opportunity to discuss with the Minister the closure of the sorting offices in the villages of Messingham, Winterton and Burton upon Stather, which very nearly lost their postal delivery staff as well. Fortunately, we managed to have that facility saved. There is no doubt that privatisation in particular has introduced a new element of ruthlessness into the Post Office. If the viability of sub-post offices is in question, they will undoubtedly fail to survive.

The Minister is not responsible for the Department of Social Security or its policies, but he is responsible for the future of sub-post offices. Many of those who run these offices are small business people. The offices are privately run on a franchise basis, and the businesses are liable to be wiped out. It is ironic that a party which claims to be for small businesses is putting the knife into many people who already face very great difficulty. When one talks to small business people, one discovers that they no longer believe that the Government are for them.

Many villages—even larger ones like Messingham—have had the experience of their one and only bank closing down and departing due to lack of viability. When the nearest bank is several miles away, it is not sensible to suggest that it would be convenient for people to have benefits paid into bank accounts. Post offices provide other very important services to many people, particularly the elderly. For example, a constituent of mine who is blind relies on people in her sub-post office to help her to fill in forms. No doubt many banks would be willing to provide such a service, but in terms of community care and support there is a distinct difference between a bank and a sub-post office. There is also the social dimension. Many people meet weekly at the post office and, as has been said, they tend to buy goods and services. That is very important for the viability of these establishments. All those are under threat. I hope that the points about monthly payments will be noted. Many pensioners on limited incomes would find it difficult to budget with monthly payments and should have the choice of weekly payments. That provision should be protected.

Bank charges have been mentioned. It is inevitable that the major banks will impose charges on personal accounts. There has been talk of that for some time. We have heard about the dreadful charges made to people who slip into overdraft, including excessive charges for the letters telling them that they are overdrawn.

People should have a choice as to how they are paid and whether payment is made monthly or weekly. The forms should not be bullying; they should not suggest to people who are not used to filling in forms, and who find them intimidating, that they will not have a choice.

Above all, we want to hear from the Minister that he will defend our system of sub-post offices. Without doubt, the proposed change would rip the heart out of many communities because it would remove an essential facility which provides community support and is convenient for many people, particularly in isolated rural areas. The change would also undermine the position of many families who have put much investment into their sub-post office businesses and who have given enormous support and commitment to the people whom they know and serve well. Consideration must be given to those people, and choice on the method of payment must be protected.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): I want to add my weight to what has been said. I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on achieving the debate. I represent an area in the southern part of Scotland. My constituency of Midlothian is made up of small towns, villages and hamlets. It borders the southern uplands of Scotland, with the Moorfoot hills on one side and the Pentlands on the other.

I do not want to repeat other speeches, but I support most of what has been said. I am worried about the lack of mobility of the people we are talking about. We have already heard that there are no bus services in some rural areas. The geographical spread of post offices is ideal. If we wanted to start from scratch to provide a post office system, we would probably place them where they are. Banks and building societies are inclined to cluster around one another. In a small town, they are all in the same street, next door to one another. That provides a choice for those who are mobile, but there are no banks in many hamlets and villages. That must be taken into account when the Minister revises Government policy, which I hope he will do.

I do business with banks in Scotland, and they are no worse than other banks. Sometimes they ask for a minimum of, say, £50 to be kept in an account to keep it in credit. Some pensioners could not afford to leave £50 in a bank account. With our salaries, we may not be concerned about other aspects concerning cheques, but when people have small, fixed incomes, every pound and every penny count.

Opening times are also important. Post offices are open longer and have more convenient opening times than some banks. That is another aspect that must be taken into cognisance when we are talking about this problem.

I shall end with this plea, because I do not want to repeat what has been said—although I endorse everything that has been said. I want to add my weight to the debate, because the problem is not peculiar to rural areas. Obviously, the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles could not be more rural. Some of the sub-post offices are in small towns. I was approached by a sub-postmaster in Dalkeith, which is a small town, who is worried that his income will drop and he will have to close. Will we see huge queues in the few sub-post offices that will be left? When payments are made, people form huge queues. If those payments are spread out, it is done in an amicable way.

I hope that the Minister will take on board what has been said. We sincerely mean what we say—it is not a matter of scoring points. We are not here to be clever, and we are not in a position to score political or any other points. We are making a plea on behalf of the people who need our help. I am sure that we all care for the people in our communities who need help.

9.30 pm

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): I should like to pay my respects on the death of Robert Adley. As a railway enthusiast all my life, I regarded him as a doyen of the railway world. As well as the loss to his family and the House, he will be a great loss to the railway industry at a time when people with his knowledge have never been more needed.

I do not want to repeat what has been said by other hon. Members. When Baroness Thatcher was Prime Minister, I remember her saying that there was no such thing as community. I am pleased that the hon. Members for Rochford (Dr. Clark) and for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) have shown that she was wrong in this, as she was in so many other things. I hope that this debate will be a precursor to debates that will save post offices. Much has been said about the deprivation of pensioners and so on, but the real issue is the loss of sub-post offices in rural areas. That is the most important aspect of the matter.

Perhaps I have been fortunate in my life, in that I have lived in many areas where there were post offices. I have lived in rural, semi-rural and extremely rural districts—I have seen it all. I have always been struck by the fact that, the more rural an area, the more important the sub-post office. I must declare a slight interest because, in my younger days, I had aspirations to own and run a sub-post office. It seemed to be an admirable way to serve society. Although I imagine that it would not be profitable, it would be a worthwhile life.

Although my constituency is mainly urban, some sections are semi-rural. The loss of post offices in my constituency would diminish the quality of life for the people who live there. The village where I live, which is not in my constituency, is a good example of the problem. If there were no post office in my village, people would need to take a bus ride costing £1·07 each way into Durham city to get to a post office—the bus service runs hourly. I am talking not simply about pensioners but about disabled people, unemployed people—there are many of them in my part of the world—and young mothers with children, who greatly appreciate and rely entirely on the post office for many things.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley referred to post offices in business. Post offices often provide services that are only marginally profitable. Such services would not be acceptable as a business in their own right. A post office in my village sells wool—it is the only place that does—and provides a clothes cleaning service. Those are valuable services.

There is nothing new about the threat to close sub-post offices. To my knowledge, the same threat has been made for the past five or six years. There were rumours that sub-post offices would be drastically cut because of the expenditure involved but they were retracted. However, they continue to come back in different guises. I am sure that Conservative Members represent more rural communities than Labour Members. We represent many towns and cities.

The Post Office has operated a wonderful service for more than 100 years, and it is now more vital than ever for old people to have a post office service close at hand. In years ahead, a larger percentage of the population will be old; moreover, they will be living even longer. Some people do not live within 10 miles of a bank—not just those living in the back of beyond; bank branches are now closing at a fair rate of knots, as are some building society offices.

My hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) represents a constituency adjoining mine. Although, as a Whip, he cannot speak in the debate, in many ways he could make a better speech than any of us, given that his constituency contains remote villages without good bus services. It is vital for all hon. Members affected by the proposals to listen to what their constituents have to say, and to impress their views on the Government.

I am always very wary of the "balance the books" mentality. It is all very well to say that excessive expenditure is at the root of a problem, and that specific action can be taken to solve it; it is all a bit like the oxo game—having dealt with one square, we find that there are eight more, each of which affects the one adjoining it.

The Government may hope to obtain short-term relief in the form of savings on the cost of benefits, but the long-term deprivation and the social costs involved could far outweigh any savings. Not many hon. Members are present tonight, but I hope that those who are present will try to persuade their colleagues of the importance of retaining what is perhaps the most important service enjoyed by villages, semi-rural areas and, often, urban areas.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) for introducing the debate, and for allowing others to speak.

Pensioners currently feel that they are under siege. They face a rise in fuel bills as result of the application of VAT and its extension to standing charges; the pressure on council finances poses a threat to their concessionary fares; crime is escalating in their neighbourhoods, and they feel that they are prisoners in their own homes. Now, on top of all that, their local post offices are threatened. They are being pressurised to leave a system that they have known for many years, and to pay money into their bank accounts. Of course that should be an option, but it should not be pressed to the extent that it has been, to the detriment of many post offices.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have cited many reasons to oppose the Government's plans, but there are others. It has been pointed out that bank branches are far less accessible than local post offices; that trend is increasing as the main banks close many of their outlying branches in a process that they describe as rationalisation. "Closure" would be a better description. Many pensioners will find it even more difficult to reach their branches if their concessionary bus passes are taken away.

The weight of correspondence received by hon. Members illustrates the difference between the relationship of banks with their customers and that of post offices with theirs. Does anyone seriously imagine that the banks could have mounted the campaign mounted by sub-postmasters in defence of their system? Pensioners clearly appreciate that—if, that is, they have an account at all. Yesterday, a parliamentary written answer revealed that 30 per cent. of those in receipt of benefit have no bank account. Indeed, I doubt whether many banks would be keen on such accounts: they seem to be putting great pressure on small account holders, and—as has been said—imposing charges.

We know the worry caused to pensioners by official letters from bank managers. There have been some tragic cases of suicide.

Pensions will be paid either four or 13 weeks in arrears. The pensioners and many others on benefit in my constituency are having trouble living from week to week and from day to day. If they have to budget one month at a time, some will be able to do so, but for a considerable number that will be a major burden and pressure.

For all those reasons, I hope that the Minister will admit that the Government have been found out and will give in on the forms with good grace. I hope that they will scrap the experiment and tonight give a message of good news to pensioners and their friends, the postmasters.

9.40 pm

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Like other speakers, I want to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) for tonight's debate, and all hon. Members who have spoken in it. It has been a constructive debate; I think that the House performs at its best when we listen to other speakers. I am as guilty as anyone of baying and braying across the Chamber, but it has been extremely edifying to sit quietly and listen to other hon. Members make their speeches.

The debate is not about right and left, but about right and wrong. The proposals are out of order and wrong. They benefit nobody except the Exchequer. Therefore, the Government's proper role of looking after people—certainly as they become older—is being denied.

I do not know who first raised the matter in the House. Before last Thursday, I received letters from pensioners in my constituency. Some of them expressed anger, some frustration and others total disbelief at the proposal. I wrote back to them saying that I would support their campaign to keep open the sub-post offices where they collected their pensions. My letter was fairly standard because one cannot say much more than that one will or will not support the campaign.

Last Thursday, the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) asked the Prime Minister a question:

"Is my right hon. Friend receiving letters, as I am, from pensioners and others receiving benefit who are concerned in case that benefit should be paid exclusively into banks and building societies? Will he confirm that benefit will continue to be available from post offices and sub-post offices, thus giving the customers a choice in line with Conservative policy?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"This is a matter on which concern is raised from time to time. We have made no proposals to make those changes. If we had any firm proposals to make those changes, we would bring them before the House."—[Official Report, 6 May 1993; Vol. 224, c. 283.]

I was immediately relieved and, by telephone, arranged for the standard letter to be altered, because letters were still arriving for me. I changed the standard letter to say that the Prime Minster had given an assurance that the House would debate the matter before the changes took place. As it is not a right and left issue, but a right and wrong issue, I believed that the House would not support the proposal. I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Rochford for obtaining that reply from the Prime Minister, with which I was delighted. I am now receiving "thank you" letters for removing some of the anger, frustration and disbelief that people felt.

More importantly, I believe that today the Prime Minister stood on its head his message of only seven days ago—I shall have to read the Official Report tomorrow to make sure of that. I am extremely worried that the changes are to take place and that people are being encouraged, by stealth or subterfuge, to follow such a course of action. As the hon. Member for Rochford said, the forms are designed in such a manner as to obtain a particular result: "Would you like to win a million pounds—yes or no?" Of course we know the answer. I can remember working in Blackpool as a photographer some years ago. The spiel we gave people was, "Would you like a set of three or the half dozen?" Much the same principle applies here.

I believe that the Prime Minister today overturned what he said last week. If he did, I will have to tell people that I am sorry about the first letter saying that we needed a campaign, and about the second, saying that the campaign was off; but here is a third letter, saying that the campaign is back on again. That is no way to run a country. If the Government have proposals, let them come clean and bring them before the House. If they do so, the proposal will be defeated by the integrity of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

9.45 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): Much of the case has been made already, so I shall be brief. We want the Minister to respond to the points that have been made so that we can intervene in his speech for clarification.

I was much taken by the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington). I know his constituency well; it contains Roker Park, the home of Sunderland football club. My father was born in the constituency, which contains a great many terraced houses and all sorts of different areas. My hon. Friend described the sub-post offices in those areas, some of which are urban, some semi-rural and some extremely rural.

My constituency, too, contains every category of area. To the north lie the outer suburbs of Sheffield—a highly urbanised place with good sub-post office provision. Then there are the semi-rural areas containing former colliery villages with adjoining fields and farms. All sorts of history and traditions are represented in my constituency.

The very rural parts are in west Derbyshire and the Derbyshire dales, where people have been devastated by some of the changes of recent years—changes which have led to a lack of community transport and many of the other problems that hon. Members have mentioned today.

My constituency contains a wide variety of political strongholds. It is divided into solid Labour areas and solid Conservative areas. On this issue I have received representations from both, particularly from the rural areas which should be natural Conservative strongholds. The Government should respond to the feelings of people in these areas.

Sub-postmasters are often important figures in local government, serving on parish and district councils. Amazingly enough, because sub-post offices have become communal centres on which people depend, these sub-postmasters can get elected either as independents or even as representatives of parties which would not do well in normal circumstances in a particular area.

We should bear that sort of loyalty and community feeling in mind, because it shows that there is something about sub-post offices of such importance that it needs to be preserved. Therefore, we want neither measures that would ruin sub-post offices nor the privatisation which might follow.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. Neil Hamilton): The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Boyce) referred to the number of letters that he has recently received on this subject. We have all received similar postbags. I sometimes ruefully reflect that if it were not for the scaremongering campaigns that occur at various times during the year and that generate large amounts of post, the position of the Post Office might be rather less viable than it is. Members of Parliament perform a valuable function in helping to support the Post Office network.

I am happy to join with hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) on drawing his place in the ballot and choosing this subject for debate. As has been said, he has been fortunate, and we have been fortunate in having an unusually extended debate on the Adjournment. As I was in charge of earlier business—the debate on the Reinsurance (Acts of Terrorism) Bill—I could have filibustered myself by keeping the debate on that Bill going so as to close off the Adjournment debate. I would not have wished to do that because this is an important matter for all our constituents, and it is right that we should debate it.

The hon. Member has stolen a march on his own Front Bench and anticipated the debate that will be held next Wednesday. We are just a warm-up act, and the star turns will have their opportunity next week. Let us compare the quality of the two debates. As the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) said, the debate has been conducted in an unusual spirit for the House of cool, calm reflection without all the heat of the party battle. I venture to think that our debate will be rather more good tempered and good humoured, and perhaps will generate more light than heat, than that which will be held next Wednesday.

I am grateful for the opportunity to place on record the Government's views on this important matter. I share opinions on it with hon. Members who have spoken from both sides of the House. As an individual Member of Parliament, and as a member of the Government, I am particularly well aware of the great value placed on the local post office in smaller rural communities. I have some 35 post offices within my constituency, which has some substantial rural areas. I know the high regard in which they are held by everybody, from pensioners to young mothers, and by all the other groups mentioned by hon. Members.

[Mr. Neil Hamilton]

I doff my cap in the direction of the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and admit that my parents-in-law live in a small rural village in the depths of Cornwall, perhaps even more remote than the villages in his constituency because they live on the Lizard peninsula. I can also tell him that they are Liberal voters, but I have never held that against them, and even on that account I would not wish to close their local post office.

We all understand that the local post office is not just somewhere to buy stamps or collect pensions. As many hon. Members have said, it is often the focal point of the community. I hardly ever use a bank because I regularly cash cheques here in the post office of the House of Commons, which is open at much more user-friendly hours than any bank. Nobody can doubt our commitment, both collectively as a Government and individually as Members of Parliament, to this important national institution.

The Government's commitment to a nation-wide network of post offices is unequivocal. Hon. Members have asked me to place on record a commitment that we will maintain a viable national network of post offices. I am happy to do that. In so doing, I am not saying anything that the House will not have heard before. We wrote that commitment into our manifesto. None of the other parties did so. That is not to impute that they are not as committed to that aim as we are, but we thought it was useful and valuable to make that commitment during the election campaign. When my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the review of the future structure and organisation of the Post Office last July, he made it clear that that commitment was not negotiable, and I have great pleasure in repeating it this evening.

I should like to explode two myths about the Post Office which often surface to call that commitment into question. The first myth is that the Post Office is in steep and inexorable decline, and the second is that the Government are gradually destroying the viability of post offices by reducing the amount of business that is put their way. I am glad to be able to tell the House that there is no truth in either of those tales. The Post Office is one of a rare breed: it is a popular and relatively successful nationalised industry. Whether it could be even more successful in the private sector is another issue which I may touch on later in the debate.

As Government, we aim to open up new opportunities for the Post Office in order to support the viability of an institution to which we are all committed. The Royal Mail is flourishing today as never before, and is widely recognised as one of the best postal services in the world. Over the past decade, Post Office Counters Ltd. has been consistently profitable, with a growing turnover and rising standards of customer services. Rumours of its demise are greatly exaggerated and do not accord with the historical trend.

How have the misunderstandings that have been alluded to in the debate come about? As with other economic developments, we always hear about the bad news, but rarely about the steady improvements and the winning of new business. As so often with the media, bad news is good news and good news is no news. We hear not about steady improvements but about closures and other deteriorations. I do not know why that happens, but there have been a number of reflections on the subject recently as a result of some remarks by Martyn Lewis.

There has been a steady improvement in the Post Office, and new business has been won. The effect of the automated credit transfer system, which gave rise to the debate, is a case in point. There was a time when the only way in which to collect a state pension or other state benefit was over the post office counter. Then, in 1982, we introduced the option of having pensions or child benefits paid directly into personal bank or building society accounts. Nearly half of new pensioners now choose that option, but when it was first introduced it was widely feared that it heralded the beginning of the end for the Post Office. That fear was widely expressed in the House at the time. My hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark)—or was it my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans)?—mentioned the diversification of post office services into other shops in the rural community. That development too gave rise to the claim that it heralded the end of the Post Office.

In fact, by a combination of options that have been introduced over the years, we have improved the delivery of services to the consumer. That may not necessarily involve the use of the post office or the sub-post office, but the consequence has not been the disappearance of post offices, especially rural sub-post offices, as an important part of local communities. In spite of the gradually increasing proportion of business going to banks and building societies, the total volume of DSS business, and hence of Government business in total, transacted through post offices has increased. The share of the pie may be smaller, but as the pie itself is bigger, the Post Office has not lost out.

The hon. Member for Western Isles mentioned the citizens charter in his opening speech. In the citizens charter we made it clear that we would extend the range of choice open to recipients of other benefits by giving them the option of having their benefits paid into bank or building society accounts. Last November the Secretary of State for Social Security announced that he would encourage more people to use that method of payment, which is cheaper to administer than post office order books, and also more secure.

It is true that there is a cost attached to different methods of payment, and in so far as we use less efficient or more costly systems of payment, the sums expended on those are not available to be spent in many other socially useful ways. Although I am saying this in a neutral way, we ought to consider as a background to this debate what the costs are.

The total cost to the DSS of paying child benefit by post office order book is currently nearly twice as high as the cost of paying it through ACT. With pensions, it is about 10 times as high. If the Post Office payment system were to be automated, the difference in cost would be considerably smaller. The point was made in the course of the debate, I think by the hon. Member for North Cornwall, that Mr. Cockburn's recent remarks about improvements in service delivery through post offices could reduce costs without reducing the degree of usage of the post office. I happily tell him this evening that we are——

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Question again proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Mr. Hamilton: I happily tell the hon. Gentleman that of course we will consider that, and any other proposal which has the effect of improving the service delivery to consumers and making it more efficient, because those efficiency savings can be passed on to the community in a variety of other valuable ways. It cannot be right for us to close our eyes to these opportunities, because it is opportunities that we are talking about.

I fully understand the nature of the fears that have been expressed in this debate, and I want to deal with them this evening.

Mr. Macdonald: The Minister took up the reference to the citizens charter. Does he accept that, as a matter of principle, full information about the choices available to pensioners should be given to them; that, as a matter of principle, it should be as easy for them to choose one option as to choose any other? There should be a level playing field available to pensioners when these options are presented to them.

Mr. Hamilton: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the forms to which he referred in some detail in the course of his speech are part of a trial which the Department of Social Security has been engaged in in an attempt to test the popularity of the different methods of payment. I have heard the criticisms that he and other hon. Members have made, and the Secretary of State for Social Security will, of course, in evaluating the response to the different forms which have been issued, bear all those criticisms in mind.

It is not for me, as a Department of Trade and Industry Minister, to second-guess what my right hon. Friend in the DSS willl say in due course, because the evaluation exercise has not yet been completed. But the fears that have been expressed by hon. Members this evening will, of course, form the backdrop to the evaluation, along with all the other responses that are received.

Mr. Olner: A few moments ago the Minister used the word "encourage". I get the impression that the Secretary of State for Social Security is doing more than encourage people with market testing and making people choose between one form of payment and another. People throughout the country can see that they are being coerced, not encouraged, to have their benefits paid through ACT or on a monthly basis. It is time that the Government came clean about this. This is why the pensioners are fearful of what is going on.

Mr. Hamilton: I cannot say any more than I have said already. I can only repeat that this is a trial. Each form has been issued to about 8,000 people, I believe. When the responses have been evaluated, the Department will be able to see the popularity of each option. Of course, if there is a design flaw in the forms and that view is accepted by the Department, that will form the backdrop to the decision. I am not in a position this evening to agree with hon. Members who have expressed their fears on this subject in the House and elsewhere, but I can say that their criticisms have been heard.

Dr. Michael Clark: It gives me no pleasure to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I shall do so for a second. My hon. Friend said that the forms were designed to test the popularity of different methods of payment of benefits and of pensions. I take issue with him on that. The forms are not designed to test the popularity of different methods of payment. If they were, we should have the level playing field that the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) mentioned. The forms are designed to discover how effectively the wool can be pulled over the eyes of those who receive pensions and benefits. They have nothing to do with the popularity of the form of payment.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Western Isles have explained the nature of the three forms, each of which I have here this evening. Their comments have been heard. I have made my own comments and I have explained the reason for the issuing of the forms. I have also explained that, when the results are complete, the Department of Social Security will take a view on the basis of everything that has been said as part of the whole debate on the matter.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I apologise for not having been here for most of the debate; I had another engagement. I entirely agree with the two points just made. No one in the House believes more fervently in freedom of choice than my hon. Friend the Minister. However, to test what people want, they must be told that they can continue to receive their benefits through post offices. I suspect that in many cases there are advantages for them in doing so, certainly in a remote rural constituency such as mine. Surely, if there is to be proper market testing, we must tell people that it is not a question of their having to be paid through the banks and building societies, but that there is also the option of their continuing to be paid through sub-post offices, especially village sub-post offices. That is the only fair way to test this.

Mr. Hamilton: I do not accept that the third form mentioned, which seems to have generated the most controversy, precludes the use of post offices from the delivery of the service. However, I shall draw my hon. Friend's words to the attention of my mother-in-law, who is one of his constituents. Whether the consequence will be that she votes for him at the next election, I cannot say.

Mr. Tyler: The Minister said just now that he could not second-guess the views of his colleagues in the Department of Social Security and we understand that. I wonder whether he will be quite so specific on the next point. A week ago, the Prime Minister appeared to say unequivocally that the Government were not committed to pressurising people towards the ACT method with which we are all concerned this evening. However, this afternoon, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), he appeared to be ambivalent; he appeared to equivocate. The Minister mentioned the political allegiance of his mother-in-law. For her benefit, for my benefit and for the benefit of the House, will the Minister tell us whether the Prime Minister was correct last week or whether he was correct this afternoon? I do not expect him to answer on behalf of the Department of Social Security, but I am sure that he has been fully briefed this evening on the views of No. 10.

Mr. Hamilton: Beauty, like ambivalence, is in the eye of the beholder. All I can say is that the Government are perfectly consistent at all times. I do not have here the words that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister uttered in the House this afternoon. I heard them at the time, but I admit that I cannot now remember exactly what he said. All I can say is that, whatever words were used in the House this afternoon, the commitment is exactly the same as that given last week.

I was making a point about the effects of ACT on the Post Office system and on its connection with the diversification of Post Office services. As with all other businesses, some lines of work will increase while others decline. New opportunities are opening for the Post Office which should bolster its position. One promising prospect, for example, could be the retailing of the national lottery. We do not yet know whether the Post Office will win a contract to sell lottery tickets, but we have extended its statutory powers so that it will be able to bid for the contract. Who knows how much business that could generate if the Post Office were successful? It could be an important element in the underpinning of the Post Office network throughout the country. Of course, I am not the Secretary of State for National Heritage. If only I were Prime Minister, it would be much more convenient, and I could answer all the points made in the debate. Perhaps I will be, one day.

Mr. Boyce: The way the hon. Member is carrying on, upsetting most of his Back Bench colleagues, it is hardly likely. I want to take up the point about post offices selling lottery tickets. That is a good proposal, but if the Government have taken away people's rights to draw their pensions at the post office, the purpose of this debate is defeated. The debate is about pensioners drawing pensions from post offices. Any additional business for post offices is a good thing, but the debate is not about that.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman poses a hypothesis. It is not Government policy to remove the right of pensioners to receive their pensions from the post office. As was said by the hon. Member for North Cornwall, the Prime Minister said last week that our policy was to encourage people to receive benefits through their accounts, while maintaining a viable network of post office outlets. So the two are not necessarily inconsistent. As was written in our manifesto, we are absolutely committed to the maintenance of a viable network of post offices throughout the country.

To return to the forms which have been sent out, I am well aware of the concern that has been expressed about the recent trial. It has been noticed in ministerial postbags as well. But I want to stress that the trial is only a trial and is merely to test the impact of different methods of presentation. I have heard the criticisms that my hon. Friends and others have made this evening, but the Department of Social Security is looking at ways of encouraging the take-up of automated credit transfer on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester) rose——

Mr. Hamilton: I would like to continue, if I may, because, as a result of willingly taking interventions, I am falling behind with my speech and I shall be unable to answer, even in three quarters of an hour, all the points made in the debate, which I am anxious to do.

Redesign of some of the forms is one of the ways being considered. None of the forms is intended to deprive benefit recipients of the option of being paid through the post office. I understand that all three forms indicated that a choice of payent methods was available, but I have heard the criticisms made by my hon. Friends, in particular, about the clarity of the way in which a particular choice was put before people. I can assure my hon. Friends that those points will be read with great care by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security in the morning.

The hon. Member for Western Isles asked me for two commitments. He asked if the Government would retract their policy to encourage pensioners to use ACT. I am afraid that I cannot give him the commitment that he sought. We have been encouraging the take-up of ACT for 10 years and we shall continue to do so. I have explained the cost background and the benefits that will flow from making the system more efficient.

The hon. Member also asked me if the test trial forms would be shredded and new ones produced with "comprehensive and unbiased" information. The management of the trial is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but I repeat the point that I have just made. It is no more than a test, and my right hon. Friend needs to assess the results before he can decide how to redesign the forms. No doubt he will take account of that point before making any decision in that respect.

Although we have a viable system of post offices around the country, particularly in rural areas, I realise that this particular claim may sound rather hollow to those living in areas which have lost their local post offices in recent years. Although that is sad, it is not something that is a feature of the 1990s or of Conservative Governments. In the past five years, the number of post offices has fallen by 1,151, but under the Labour Government a similar fall—of 1,190—occurred between 1974 and 1979. The figures are almost identical. Between 1965 and 1970, 541 post offices were closed.

The trend of post office closure has gone on for some time and at the end of each year there are usually a smaller number of post offices than there were at the beginning of it. If that trend continued, however, one would cease to have a viable national network. Many of the arguments that have been put forward today with such vigour and eloquence could equally have been made at any time in the past 30 years, given the steady decline in the number of post offices.

A large networked organisation such as Post Office Counters Ltd. is generally successful, but some individual post offices are struggling. Demographic changes and changes in shopping patterns mean that in certain areas the viability of post offices grows weaker. Rural offices, in particular, are vulnerable to those changes as traditional village life changes and declines. I deplore that because I live in a small village and I particularly value its community life.

Mr. Harris: Surely we should be looking at new ways in which to attract extra business to post offices. My hon. Friend has already mentioned, quite properly, the possibility of their selling lottery tickets, but we should ease the restrictions and inhibitions on post offices so that they can do other business. Another feature of rural areas —it is certainly true of mine, as it no doubt is of my hon. Friend's constituency—is that the sub-branches of the banks are closing down. Why not lift the inhibitions from sub-post offices so that they can do a deal with the banks to act as their agents? That would encourage the viability of those post offices. We must not be defeatist about village post offices.

Mr. Hamilton: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and that is the value of the Post Office review, which is under way at the moment. That review has led to exactly the same type of scaremongering as that which has given rise to the campaign mentioned in the debate. Because the Government do not want to set parameters on the general review of opportunities open to the Post Office, we could be asked to rule out various options. Eventually, we would end up with a real dog's breakfast.

As in so many areas, nationalisation has imposed restrictions on the development of an important industry. If those restrictions were removed, it could offer new life to a great national institution. The post office review will certainly consider all the options, such as those suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). I hope that that review will breathe new life into the post office system.

The Post Office is very keen to be released from the bonds and shackles of state control. Consequently, it would be wrong if we dismissed any options. I regret, therefore, the timidity of those who have poured scorn on the Post Office review and have caused many people to worry unduly about its outcome.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hamilton: I am reluctant to do so because the hon. Gentleman was not here for much of the debate and I want to respond to those hon. Members who have been present throughout.

It is always regrettable when a local post office has to close, but I am pleased to say that for an increasing number of smaller offices salvation has been found in the introduction of community post offices.

Offices are open on a part-time basis, according to the level of business transacted. The Post Office introduced that programme in 1988 and it has proved successful in keeping a local service going which might otherwise have been withdrawn following the retirement of the existing sub-postmaster or sub-postmistress. That is a current problem. There are many instances where a sub-postmaster retires and the post office cannot find a replacement. Indeed, it is a serious problem in some rural areas.

I do not know if it is a problem in the Western Isles, where there are 85 post offices. As the hon. Member for that constituency said eloquently in his speech, the local post office is the most widespread meeting point and community institution in that scattered area. Finding a successor to the postmaster or postmistress is a serious problem in some parts of the country.

Hon. Members are familiar with some of the more colourful examples of community offices mentioned in recent debates about the rural network. They illustrate the benefits of flexibility and the opportunity to develop that has arisen in recent years. Community post offices have opened in pubs, churches, even garden sheds and front rooms. That trend would not have been thinkable prior to the developments of recent years.

I agree with the hon. Member for Nuneaton (Mr. Olner) that if it were Government policy to close rural sub-post offices it would be a foolish policy. That is not our policy. Curiously enough, there has been much community of interest and agreement in the debate, and it has in many ways been similar to the previous debate in which I starred— [Interruption.] I was searching for the right word, which sometimes eludes me.

There is a commitment to achievement of the same objective. The means by which we would get there may be different, but our objective is the same. We have affirmed our commitment to the nationwide network of post offices, including the rural network.

The fact that Government business transacted through post offices has not decreased but increased in each of the last few years is a demonstrable illustration of the Government's commitment to the policy that we declared in our manifesto. The Post Office is making strenuous efforts, in particular in co-operation with the Rural Development Commission, to keep small rural post offices open, particularly in areas where changing shopping patterns have been threatening their viability.

As I come to the question of the Post Office review, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley, who dealt with the matter in the context of his extremely scattered constituency, which I know well as I spent some time there in a by-election not long ago— [Interruption.] In the general election I was otherwise engaged in my own constituency. The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), with his usual percipience, spotted why my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley lost the by-election but won the general election.

I appreciate that his constituency is scattered and that the importance of the local post office in Ribble Valley is not to be understated. The Post Office review gives great opportunity, as my hon. Friend recognised, for scattered rural areas of that kind. I cannot tonight state when our decisions will be made public because no decisions have yet been made, but my hon. Friend can rest assured that when we have something to say on the matter it will be announced to the House. In the meantime, I assure everybody that the review is being undertaken with no preconceptions as to its outcome and that we are looking at both public and private sector options.

It has been said tonight that the privatisation of the Post Office might lead to large numbers of post office closures. The hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) said that. Although no decisions have been made—so speculation about the effect of privatisation would be idle—I believe that the impact of greater flexibility to which loosening the bonds of state control has given rise in other formerly nationalised industries would be to the benefit of the Post Office and would underpin the network to which we are all committed.

That is why I regret the confusion that has been created in recent times over the impact of ACT and the possible impact of privatisation. Those two issues ought to be considered separately, because our policy of encouraging ACT on a voluntary basis has been in place for some time —for 10 years or so—and we have yet to decide whether to privatise part or all of the Post Office. Whatever the outcome of the review, our commitment to a nationwide network of post offices will not be compromised. There are ways to protect the network, whether it be in the public or the private sector, and also whatever services the Post Office provides.

I remind hon. Members, as did the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) in his speech, that 19,000 of the 20,000 post offices are already in the private sector, because all sub-post offices are run by individual entrepreneurs. They contract for their services with the Post Office, but the premises and the business itself are firmly in the private sector. That has been a great strength of the system.

The Post Office's programme of converting Crown offices to agency status has been successful in improving efficiency, with Post Office services having been transferred to the private sector. There is no inconsistency at all between the private sector option and the provision of services that hitherto were the responsibility of a nationalised institution. What matters is the Government's commitment to those services being available on a widespread and viable basis throughout the country. I am happy yet again to reaffirm that commitment.

Mr. Morley: There is still a great risk in privatising the core of a service such as the Post Office, which is in part publicly controlled but which, of course, has a private interest element—the contracting out of sub-post offices. I draw the Minister's attention to the privatisation of the electricity boards. Has he thought about the number of showrooms that have been closed as the electricity companies seek to maximise their revenue? We believe that, as well as having a duty to make a profit, the Post Office should provide a public service.

Mr. Hamilton: It is a little far-fetched to compare electricity showrooms with post offices. I do not therefore intend to respond to the hon. Gentleman's point, as only a couple of minutes are left to me.

We are considering in our review whether there are ways of organising all or part of Post Office business in such a way as to enable further gains to be made and the customer to have even better services while safeguarding our nationwide network commitment and our universal mail service obligation. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has made it crystal clear—there was no ambivalence or ambiguity about it—that the two unbreakable commitments on the basis of which our Post Office review is predicated are, first, that a nationwide network of post offices and a universal postal delivery service at a uniform tariff will be preserved and, secondly, that our universal mail service obligation, whatever the outcome of the review, will be as it is now.

We are, however, seeking to improve efficiency in order to reduce costs. The consequence will be that money which is now wasted can be channelled into other more productive and socially useful services. That must be the objective and aim of us all in the debate. Nobody benefits from waste. We must seek to use scarce resources in ways that are most productive and that give the greatest satisfaction to consumers. That, of course, is the rationale for the existence of any business. We believe in striving constantly for improvements. If there is a way to improve the current arrangements, whether through privatisation or in any other way, we shall not shrink from making appropriate changes.

I hope that during this valuable and interesting debate I have been able to allay the fears of at least some hon. Members, though the experience of many years in politics inclines me to believe that such optimism is usually misplaced. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Western Isles and to all those who have participated in the debate for this opportunity to run over issues which are of such concern to our constituents. I look forward to seeing act 2 on Wednesday, when the ringmaster of the drama, as on this occasion, will be the hon. Member for Jarrow. On that——

The motion having been made at Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at half-past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 14 May 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Suspect Package (Abingdon Street)

9.34 am

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Has it been brought to your attention that a little while ago a suspect package was found in the area of Abingdon street, not far from the Palace of Westminster? I understand that traffic congestion in the area is severe. It is possible that there are hon. Members who have been unable to reach the Chamber until now and who I know will be anxious to take part in this morning's debate. Have you received any representations on the matter from any hon. Members? Would you consider perhaps adjourning the sitting for a while so that we can ensure that all interested hon. Members are here for the beginning of the debate?

Madam Speaker: I have been told about the suspect package and the chaos and disturbance that it caused. I have also been told on the best possible authority that the roads have been clear since 9.15 today and, therefore, I think that that gives ample time for hon. Members to be here by 9.30.

PETITION

Live Animals (Sales)

9.35 am

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): I wish to present a petition, signed by 20,000 people, on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Alan Clark, of the group Puppywatch, which strongly objects to the sale of puppies and other live animals through dealers, agents and third parties such as pet shops and other retail outlets.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House notes these objections and brings forward measures to prevent such sales.

To lie upon the Table.

BILL PRESENTED

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (ABOLITION OF NOT PROVEN VERDICT) (SCOTLAND)

Mr. George Robertson presented a Bill to abolish, in Scotland, the not proven verdict in criminal proceedings; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 2 July, and to be printed. [Bill 197.]

Orders of the Day

Noise and Statutory Nuisance Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered

Schedule 2

CONSENT TO THE OPERATION OF LOUDSPEAKERS IN STREETS OR ROADS

Amendment proposed: No. 1, in page 15, line 33, after 'loudspeaker', insert

'in connection with any election or'.—[Mr. Hunter.]

9.37 am

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I wish to speak briefly to the amendment as an opportunity to demonstrate the importance of the legislation. I fear that the Bill is another example of the way in which the House should follow the maxim

"The road to hell is paved with good intentions."

Indeed, that maxim should be above the doorway here in appropriate Latin.

Undoubtedly, this is a well-intentioned Bill. Clause 8 is well intentioned, schedule 2 is well intentioned, and the amendment is well intentioned. However, I shall speak against the amendment because it would impose on the enforcement authorities an added burden that they simply cannot be asked to carry at this stage.

I am astounded by the cavalier way in which the House is being invited to deal with this important legislation. I do not believe that it is sufficient for the House to rely on the discussion in another place to correct the mistakes that may be made here. Hon. Members will be aware that there was a brief Committee stage—I do not hold that against the Committee. Obviously, that shows that there is great support for the Bill's intentions, but no one can pretend that every aspect of the legislation was adequately discussed upstairs. Similarly, the House has the opportunity to listen to democratic representations from our constituents and those who are affected by the legislation that we seek to enact. The other place has a different role.

I do not believe that the amendment, the schedule, the clause and the Bill deserve such inadequate attention, on three grounds: first, definition; secondly, enforcement; and, thirdly, consequent cost to the councils and the police who will have the responsibility for enforcing the legislation. In case some hon. Members are here on a false pretence—perhaps they are interested in other Bills—I should point out that the amendment will have this effect. Clause 8 says that a local authority may resolve that schedule 2 will apply——

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): What does my hon. Friend mean by "false pretence"? I hope that he will bear in mind that many hon. Members are here as supporters of an important Bill, which is supported by a great many Liberal Democrat supporters in the west country.

Mr. Tyler: I understand the point made by my right hon. Friend, but I will not be lured into a discussion on the merits of another Bill because I am sure that Mr. Deputy Speaker would rule me out of order. Perhaps I could also remind my right hon. Friend that interventions take time. My speech is reasonably elastic. I have time to answer any interventions that may be made, but I hope to stick to the point. I shall do so much more succinctly if I have no interference or interventions from my hon. Friends, or, indeed, from other hon. Members.

Clause 8 provides:

"A local authority may resolve that Schedule 2 is to apply to its area."

Schedule 2(1)(2) says:

"A consent shall not be given to the operation of a loudspeaker for the purpose of advertising any entertainment, trade or business."

The amendment seeks to insert

"in connection with any election".

I am sure that you have read the report of the Committee proceedings, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There was no real discussion of this point. There was no demand from members of the Committee that the Bill should be extended in that way. There was no preliminary discussion of the amendment.

Let me turn to the question of definition. What does "in connection with any election" mean? Let us take an example. Suppose the noble Lord Tebbit toured Newbury in recent weeks in a loudspeaker van prophesying hell-fire and damnation if the Maastricht treaty was ratified, and inviting residents to meet him in the salubrious surroundings of Newbury racecourse. If he did not promote the candidature of an individual, would he be exempt? Who is to say?

Let us take another example. If the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) deafened the streets of his constituency calling on his local authority to take action under his legislation, that would be political. But would it be in connection with any election? If it fell outside an election period, clearly it would not. What is his justification for that discrimination? Why should an election be inherently more objectionable and why should the noise that it perpetrates be controlled with more vigour than another political campaign at a different time of the year?

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tyler: I give way.

The hon. Gentleman seems to have had second thoughts.

Suppose the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) drove around Westminster or Pimlico extolling the virtues of his "Access to Accommodation Bill" either during or outside an election period. That would surely be exempt under the schedule as amended by amendment No. 1. Who is to say? Who will act as thought police following the loudspeakers and recording every word? Will they say, "He has mentioned a candidate, so he is speaking in connection with an election", or, "No, he is talking about the council tax", or, "He is talking about the water rates."? How can anyone distinguish between the two without monitoring everything that is said over the loudspeaker system?

On the subject of enforcement, if the House intends to place extra responsibilities on the shoulders of environmental health officers or the police, I plead with it to listen to what their representatives say about placing those added burdens on them. Already both are rightly resentful that they are being asked to achieve the impossible with regard to noise nuisance. The Government have not given them adequate resources. Local authorities are starved of funds for existing statutory obligations on noise. The Government and Parliament keep inventing and adding more obligations, but they provide no more resources.

The public are being encouraged to have unrealistic expectations. I represent a rural area. People who go to live in rural areas all too often expect a level of quietness and peace which is unrealistic. I give one example. In the Western Morning News we have had a succession of interesting reports about the case of Corky the cockerel. The judge decided that its crowing was an assault on the ears which seriously interfered with the sleep and comfort of its neighbours. As a result, there was a £25,000 court bill for Corky the cockerel.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): I fully appreciate that the hon. Gentleman may be interested in the activities of Corky the cockerel, but does he accept that it seems to some of us that he is speaking at great length for no reason other than that he possibly wants to delay our reaching the next business? Given the allegation that he has contacts with the Shopping Hours Reform Council, I suspect that he is abusing the House in seeking to delay——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The Chair will decide whether there is any abuse of the House.

9.45 am

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy speaker. I certainly do not intend to be lured into discussion of another issue.

If amendment No. 1 is passed, both the police and environmental health officers will be asked to encourage among the public an even greater expectation that every noise can be controlled. As in the case of the loudspeaker vans which are the subject of the amendment, subjective judgment will make all the difference.

What are we asking EHOs to do? Other hon. Members may have a different experience of their local authorities —perhaps the hon. Member for Basingstoke has—but my local authorities are already overworked. They have far too much responsibility in many areas and we should not add something that lacks definition and clarity and therefore relies on subjective judgment.

The law is already seen to be something of an ass on the subject of noise nuisance. In view of the anxiety of the hon. Member for Basingstoke to make progress, I shall not read the whole report, but a young mother has been warned by her local council to keep her teething baby quiet or face court and a fine of up to £5,000.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will the hon. Member give way?

Mr. Tyler: A recent report said:

"Cannock Chase council 'noise pollution officers' issued the ultimatum to Jackie Whitehouse, 24, after neighbours complained that eight-month old Zoe was depriving them of sleep by crying through the night."

Did the hon. Gentleman want to intervene?

Mr. John Marshall: I merely wanted to find out which damn fool local authority had done that. I thank the hon. Gentleman for telling us.

Mr. Tyler: Enforcement costs a great deal of money. No precise figures have been given for the cost of introducing the Bill, with or without the amendment. But this confusing amendment will clearly add to that cost. The best estimate that has been made is that the cost to public funds

"will probably exceed £0·5 million."

It probably will.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): The hon. Gentleman mentioned a court bill of £25,000 in the case of Corky the cockerel. It may be unusual for a Conservative Member to pray in aid the BBC, but Radio 4 went into the case of cockerels keeping people awake. It found that the solution was simply to raise the perch higher so that the cockerel could not get its head up to crow loudly. That would be a considerable saving on the £25,000 which the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Tyler: I had better not follow the hon. Gentleman's point too far because, unless the cockerel is in a loudspeaker van, it is not germane to the debate. I do not propose to crow on that subject any longer.

Organisations representing environmental health officers and the police are sceptical about the Bill. They feel that it imposes on them extra responsibilities without the clarity that they need to ensure that the cost is kept to a minimum. There is no evidence of which I am aware—I am sure that the Minister will respond to this point; I see that he is taking advice—that local authorities have asked for the amendment, the schedule or the clause.

The rapid introduction of the measures in the Bill will put a special strain on local authorities throughout Britain which have difficult budgetary decisions to take. I tabled an amendment to postpone the implementation of the Bill. It was not selected. However, I hope that the point will be recognised as a serious one about the way in which the legislation is drafted.

Local authorities may share my fears and may simply refuse to take up schedule 2, which will remain a dead letter on the statute book, with or without the amendment. If that were to happen, surely it is irresponsible for the House to pass something that is innocuous because we believe that it will be useless. Why are we being asked to pass the amendment on the nod? To adopt such an attitude to the Bill does no credit to the hon. Member for Basingstoke or to the House.

Today we are all Back Benchers; this is a Back-Bench day. This Back Bencher has grave misgivings about slipshod legislation, such as the Bill. It would be irresponsible of us to rely on the other place to correct our mistakes. The resulting cost and confusion of passing the Bill, as amended, whatever its good intentions, will be to the discredit of the House. It will also lead to confusion on the part of those who are asked to enforce our legislation.

A persistent rumour has circulated that the accelerated and abbreviated procedure adopted this morning is an attempt by those on the respective Front Benches to manipulate the House. I am a Back Bencher and I am not party to what the Whips may do, but I do not believe that it is right for Back Benchers to allow themselves to be bullied on a Friday by the Whips. I invite the hon. Member for Basingstoke to justify his amendment or to answer my questions and decide to withdraw it.

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I deeply regret that contribution from the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), which was largely irrelevant. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman has not studied the Bill, because the amendment would maintain the status quo.

The hon. Gentleman may be unaware that loudspeakers can be used during election campaigns between the hours of 8 am and 9 pm. That practice is continued under the Bill. It is extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman should wax so lyrical about an amendment which he has obviously not understood.

I do not understand why the hon. Gentleman said that the Bill has not been considered sufficiently. The Committee, which lasted the best part of a morning, considered 38 amendments in great detail.

I shall explain briefly the effect of the amendment. It will ensure that loudspeakers can be used during elections between the hours of 8 am and 9 pm, as is currently the practice.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I served on the Committee and I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) has said.

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall develop my argument first.

If the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) has studied the Official Report of the proceedings of Standing Committee C, he will be aware that I had lengthy discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside about noise nuisance. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke assured the Committee that by the time the Bill returned to the Floor of the House, the concerns that had been raised in Committee would have been addressed.

Nearly every member of the Committee said that, from experience, he or she would be happy if the use of loudspeakers were outlawed during general elections. We all felt that we were more likely to lose votes if we used such loudspeakers.

Mr. Tyler: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall do so in a moment.

I am more than satisfied that my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke, along with my hon. Friend the Minister, has addressed the concerns raised in the Committee.

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Basingstoke have failed to address my point. I understand that the incumbent in a constituency might be only too pleased if one were not allowed to use loudspeakers during an election campaign, but the incumbent's interest is not always the same as that of the wider democracy. Neither of the hon. Members has taken up my key point about the distinction between and other political campaigning. I want to know how and why one should distinguish between the two.

Mr. Brown: We covered that point in Committee. We accepted that the use of loudspeakers in general elections was a special case, but hon. Members wanted to restrict their use on other occasions. I accept the restrictions that are imposed on the Bill and the specific circumstances for which we are legislating this morning.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 2, as amended, agreed to.

[Mr. Brown]

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Mr. Barry Field: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I invite you to leave the Chair for a moment and come down to my end of the Chamber, where you will observe that there is a footstool below the Mace? I wonder whether Madam Speaker has it in mind, later today, to confer some great honour of the House upon some hon. Member, as yet unknown. Perhaps the footstool has been placed there in readiness for that occasion. Can you enlighten the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I cannot enlighten the hon. Gentleman.

Shops (Amendment) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 14

POWER OF SECRETARY OF STATE TO AMEND PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

'.—(1) Subject to subsections (3) and (4) below, the Secretary of State may, by order made by statutory instrument, amend—

(a) the categories of shop exempt from the provisions of this Act under section 2 above;

(b) Schedule 2 to this Act (which relates to the categories of shop entitled to Class A registration);

(c) the classes of shop entitled to be registered under subsection (5) of section 3 above; and

(d) subsection (5) of section 3 above by substituting for the words "two hours", such longer period, not exceeding six hours as the Secretary of State may specify.

(2) An order under subsection (1) may also include such incidental, consequential, supplementary and transitional provisions as the Secretary of State may consider appropriate.

(3) No order shall be made under subsection (1) which (either alone or together with any other similar orders) would have the effect of exempting all shops, or substantially all shops, from the provisions of this Act.

(4) No order shall be made under subsection (1) unless a draft thereof has been laid before and approved by each House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Ray Powell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.56 am

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment (a) to the new clause, in line 15, leave out subsection (3).

New clause 10—Extension of Classes of Registration—

'.—(1) The Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument modify section 3 above by adding further classes under which shops may be registered or amending or removing any classes for the time being specified in that section.

(2) An order under this section makes such transitional, consequential or incidental provision (including provision modifying this Act or any other enactment) as the Secretary of State considers expedient in connection with the order.

(3) A statutory instrument containing an order under this section shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Powell: I recall that I was once promised an orange box, so perhaps the footstool to which the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) referred was brought in for me in the hope that, when I stood on it, at least I would be recognised by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and called to move my new clause. I am pleased that, at last, after 12 months, you have been able to catch my eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker and call me to speak. I am extremely grateful.

A point of order was raised earlier this morning about the cordoning off of Lambeth bridge and part of the Thames embankment. I was rather alarmed when my taxi was diverted from the House of Commons. I thought that perhaps it was a deliberate attempt on the part of the Home Secretary to keep hon. Members from attending this important debate in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has declared a great interest.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: Is it to do with Lambeth bridge?

Mr. Marshall: No; it is germane to the Bill.

Mr. Powell: But I have not started to discuss it yet. With all due respect, I was just about to start discussing my new clause, but first I want to wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a very good morning. Before I put my strong case for the new clause, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

Mr. Marshall: The answer to my question will be of great help to the House, the Minister and the country. Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Bill, as amended in Committee, is now the preferred option of the Keep Sunday Special campaign to the Bill that the Minister has promised to produce next month?

Mr. Powell: When hon. Members thoroughly examine the Bill, as amended in Committee, I hope that they will understand that if it receives its Third Reading before 2.30 pm and is then sent to the Lords, in all probability it will come back, as amended in the Lords, and be further considered. Numerous amendments and new clauses have been tabled. I am surprised that they were not tabled in Committee by the same Members who have tabled them today. I know that the hon. Member for Hendon, South is rather aggrieved that he did not serve on the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, but that was not entirely my fault, although I appointed all the hon. Members who served on the Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that we have had sufficient preliminaries. Will the hon. Gentleman now come to the new clause, please?

10 am

Mr. Powell: It was not my intention to table any new clauses or further amendments for the Report stage of the Bill, which was not first, but second, in today's list. An attempt could have been made by a number of hon. Members, even Opposition Members, to filibuster on the previous Bill until about 2.30 pm to prevent further consideration of my Bill on Report. It was not the intention of any of my Bill's supporters to table any new clauses or amendments.

As someone who is innocent and trusting, even naive, I thought that very few amendments or new clauses would be tabled due to the efforts of my colleagues and me to ensure that the Committee represented the views of the Government and the Shopping Hours Reform Council. The majority of Government Members appointed to serve on the Committee had ample opportunity to submit new clauses and amendments to which the Committee could have given detailed consideration.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire) rose——

Mr. Powell: I shall not give way now.

I was appalled, disappointed, disillusioned and frustrated to find that those who had asked to be members of the Committee and who had opposing views found it necessary on Report to table 13 new clauses and 99 amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman come to the subject of the new clause?

Hon. Members: The hon. Gentleman is filibustering.

Mr. Powell: I am not filibustering. Hon. Members will be surprised at the shortness of my speech. I want to allow everyone else the opportunity to speak.

The new clause covers the wide aspects of the alternatives open to the House. I hope that later today the House will be given the opportunity to vote on the issues. The House must decide whether it agrees with the Government view of total deregulation or the Shopping Hours Reform Council's view of partial deregulation. It is important to discuss the other items on the agenda, so I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will be tolerant and will allow me to develop my argument, which needs to be placed on record, if nothing else.

What hope did I, as a Back Bencher, have of presenting a Bill of such complexity and steering it to its Report stage? It was an achievement to pilot it through Committee, and I was able to bring it to its Report stage only with the help of devoted people from the Keep Sunday Special Campaign, the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and other specialists. They have helped us to accomplish what we have achieved.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: I shall give way in a minute as the hon. Gentleman made excellent contributions in Committee, and I give him credit for his regular attendance. He was particularly helpful in resolving a legal complexity in Committee, for which I am grateful. I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but first I want to place on record some necessary remarks.

The new clause embraces the main issues being debated throughout the country by organisations, many of which have millions of pounds' worth of vested interests. Others, like myself, have a main interest in trying to keep Sunday special for as long as is humanly possible.

Mr. Fabricant rose——

Mr. Powell: I shall give way as I can see that the hon. Gentleman is becoming very frustrated.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman said that the Government have a particular view on Sunday trading, but would he not concede that the Government have no view? Individual Government Members may have a view, but the Government have no view and will be offering free choice. The hon. Gentleman also said that we had the opportunity to discuss the subject fully in Committee, but would he not concede that, of 21 members of the Committee, barely two or three are actually deregulationists?

Mr. Powell: I am surprised: the hon. Gentleman is more naive than I if he thinks that the Government do not have a view on the matter. The Home Secretary and a number of other Ministers have shown that they are in favour of total deregulation. Therefore, it is important to give the new clause serious consideration.

I stayed awake by my telephone most of the night thinking that, after so many U-turns in the House since last Thursday, there might be another one and I would receive a telephone call from the Home Secretary to say that he had changed his mind and was prepared to give my Bill a free wind and perhaps even help it be placed on the statute book. When the House considers the new clause, I hope that we shall vote and decide that it is high time that the Shops Act 1950 was altered. I hope that my Bill will be enacted, so that instead of the present state of limbo we can protect those people who need it—small shopkeepers who are being exploited as a result of the big five being allowed to violate the law, open on Sunday and profit from it.

I read an article in yesterday's Daily Mail on Sainbury's profits. David Sainsbury said that part of the profits had accrued as a result of trading on Sunday—[HON. MEMBERS: "Illegally. "] Yes, illegally. Not many of the big stores are legally entitled to trade on Sunday. David Sainsbury admitted frankly that Sainsbury was trading illegally and gained extra profits as a result.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I appeal to the hon. Gentleman to address his remarks to the new clause. I have been very tolerant with him, but he has strayed rather far from it.

Mr. Powell: Perhaps if I were to read out the new clause that would be the best solution to the dilemma facing you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It reads:

' .—(1) Subject to subsections (3) and (4) below, the Secretary of State may, by order made by statutory instrument, amend—

(a) the categories of shop exempt from the provisions of this Act under section 2 above;

(b) Schedule 2 to this Act (which relates to the categories of shop entitled to Class A registration);

(c) the classes of shop entitled to be registered under subsection (5) of section 3 above; and

(d) subsection (5) of section 3 above by substituting for the words "two hours", such longer period, not exceeding six hours as the Secretary of State may specify.

(2) An order under subsection (1) may also include such incidental, consequential, supplementary and transitional provisions as the Secretary of State may specify.

(3) No order shall be made under subsection (1) which (either alone or together with any other similar orders) would have the effect of exempting all shops, or substantially all shops, from the provisions of this Act.

(4) No order shall be made under subsection (1) unless a draft thereof has been laid before and approved by each House of Parliament.'.

If you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, analyse what I have been saying, you will find that it was all relevant to the new clause that I have read out to the House, even though it is a highly technical clause.

I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members gathered here this morning will have been able to follow and understand the provisions of the new clause far more quickly than I could when I first read it. I am sure that they are all cleverer than I am; they know exactly what it means, how it affects the Bill and how it will bear on the votes to be taken later today.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): In a constituency such as mine—if I may be so impertinent, I remind the hon. Gentleman that it is the Isle of Wight—we regularly play host to yacht races that come across the channel and across other long distances. Those yachts are regularly delayed by heavy weather, such as gales, and local chandleries stay open so that the crews can make their purchases and repair their breakages. If I understand the new clause correctly, it would require the Secretary of State to have the powers of the Almighty to be able to predict when such heavy weather might take place in the channel, so that he could then prescribe the opening hours for the chandleries in the Isle of Wight in advance.

At present we are covered by the exemptions in the law, and I ask the hon. Gentleman to put his mind to this point, because it worries my constituents.

10.15 am

Mr. Powell: The hon. Gentleman's point is not relevant to the new clause, but regulations under the Bill would allow for the problem of special exemptions. The last thing that I or the sponsors of the Bill want is to subject the hon. Gentleman's constituents to restrictions. He represents a lovely area where people enjoy their regattas. The Isle of Wight does have occasional bad weather—but not as much as we get in Wales. We have no desire to curtail the enjoyment of people in the Isle of Wight or of those who visit the area. The Bill provides for resort areas and for towns that are frequented by visitors. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have looked after his constituents' interests in preparing the Bill.

I believe that all hon. Members who may be called to speak in today's debates should declare their financial interest if they have one. Quite a number of them have a direct interest in the businesses that we specify in the Bill. As for me, I proudly declare my interest: it is my true belief that we desperately need to keep Sunday a special day in this country. The new clause attempts to do just that. Crime is on the increase. We desperately need to keep one day of the week different from the other six working days.

I should like to read out a letter from a Mrs. Hilda Stevens:

"I have just found your address in my parish magazine. I am 87 years old and nearly housebound, but Sunday has been a special day all my life and I hope it is not too late for me to send you a little help."

The letter is signed by Mrs. Stevens, who enclosed a £10 cheque to help the Keep Sunday Special campaign.

I was impressed by that lady's generosity—no doubt £10 represents a great deal for someone of 87. She has obviously kept Sunday a special day all her life, and throughout the country most families keep Sunday a special day when they can get together, the grandchildren can visit the grandparents, and people can have a day of rest.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, psychologically, millions of people need a day to recharge their batteries as well as for religious purposes? Is he aware, though, that many of my constituents are concerned, because their day of rest, of religious reflection and of pause in the hurly burly of the working week is Saturday because of their Jewish faith? Is he confident that the Bill, as amended in Committee, would take care of those anxieties and would allow Jewish shops to be open on a Sunday?

Mr. Powell: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Committee gave careful consideration to the Jewish problem. I am entirely satisfied that it is comprehensively covered in one of the amendments tabled for consideration today. It is fully in accord with what the Jewish people wanted. In Committee, I spoke at great length on that subject when moving a new clause, but we found that it had to be amended, so we withdrew it. I know that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) has tabled a new clause on the subject. I consulted one of the appropriate officers of the Jewish people only this week to ensure that the interests of the Jewish people are fully covered and that they are not left out, and they submitted amendments for Report.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Sales of wet fish on a Sunday—which are permitted under the 1950 Act—are a matter of vital interest to Grimsby. My hon. Friend gave undertakings in Committee that such sales would be allowed under the Bill. How will that commitment be fulfilled? Is it fulfilled by the new clause?

Mr. Powell: If we have a vote on the three major issues, I am sure that the clause can be inserted and amendments can be inserted into the Bill as it stands.

I have spoken of my interest in keeping Sunday special. One of my other interests is——

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has said that new amendments can be added to the Bill today. I concede that I have been a Member of Parliament for only 13 months and that I am inexperienced, but is that correct? Can new amendments be added over and above those already on the amendment paper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. Before I call the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) to resume his speech, let me yet again draw his attention to the fact that he has been speaking at some length, but much of what he has said goes outside the new clause. I know that he has tried, and he has read out the new clause, but he is still straying rather wide.

Mr. Powell: I am guided by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as we all are, but I thought that the new clause was comprehensive. It covers all aspects of the Bill. I am sorry if I have strayed.

An important point of the Bill that would also be affected by the new clause is that giving employment protection to employees in Scotland. Shops have been opening on Sundays in Scotland for many years, but there has been no such protection for employees. Of all the available options, that is the only one which would offer employees protection.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Powell: Wait a minute. If the hon. Gentleman is not popping up to make interventions, he is popping up to make points of order. He should let the hon. Member who is promoting the Bill have a chance. Let me pay tribute to the deputy general secretary of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers and others who have assisted in attempts to ensure that the Bill provides employment protection.

The Committee considered three major contentious issues—DIY stores, garden centres, and the size of convenience stores. The new clause incorporates the views expressed on those issues. It includes a new class of registration, a wider range of tourist shops, registration provisions and definition of shops that was revised to limit the number of services regulated by the Bill.

The Committee considered all the issues and hon. Members were rightly disturbed to find on the amendment paper so many new clauses and amendments. We feel that it is an attempt to stop the Bill having a Third Reading so that it can go on to the House of Lords for further amendment. How does any hon. Member think that a Bill of this magnitude could start its Report stage at 10 o'clock on a Friday and finish at 2.30 with the House having debated 13 new clauses and 135 amendments? It would be impossible. Those who have tabled the new clauses and amendments know that.

The new clause allows the House to decide whether it wants complete deregulation, shopping hours reform proposals or the Bill as greatly amended in Committee and presented here this morning. I hope that all hon. Members will consider the issues involved and give the Bill a fair wind so that it can go on to the other place. When it comes back, I hope that it will be further considered in time given by the Government so that the question of Sunday trading can be resolved properly by the House.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Unfortunately, I was not a member of the Committee. Is my hon. Friend saying that the Committee gave long and detailed consideration to the issues in the Bill, but that, even so, all the new clauses and amendments have been tabled as a deliberate attempt to block progress on an important social issue?

Mr. Powell: I agree with my hon. Friend, who represents the neighbouring constituency to mine—indeed, the constituency that I represented in 1983. I am glad that he has made that point, which emphasises and repeats mine, because it is necessary not only for hon. Members but those outside who might be listening to realise and appreciate how easy it is to filibuster and spoil private Members' Bills.

I am sure that in our deliberations today we shall consider the consequences of what happened last Thursday. We shall consider the message delivered by the Prime Minister about curbing arrogance. I am sure that all hon. Members will try to appreciate that we need a new amended Shops Act to deal with Sunday trading. The vehicle for achieving that is available this morning for all hon. Members to vote on. If hon. Members give it proper consideration, without bias or selfishness, the Bill will proceed to the Lords.

10.30 am

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): This is a useful new clause, although its drafting is complex. It presents three options, which the Government have said that they, too, will present in due course. Subsection (3) states:

"No order shall be made under subsection (1) which . . . would have the effect of exempting all shops"— that is the total deregulation formula. Voting for amendment (a) would make that part of our future Sunday trading arrangements: a majority in favour of the amendment would clearly constitute a majority in favour of full deregulation. We should then know where we stood. If the amendment were disallowed, we should at least know that the majority did not want full deregulation.

As it stands, new clause 14 incorporates, in outline, many of the suggestions of the Shopping Hours Reform Council, including the substitution of six hours for two hours. If the new clause—with or without amendment (a)—were opposed, that would suggest that the House broadly preferred the Bill in its present form.

Today's debate provides us with an opportunity to choose between the three options in the new clause. Would not it be tantalising for everyone concerned, not least the Government's business managers, if the House were able—on a single Friday before the Whitsun recess—to decide a matter so controversial that, were the Government to present their own legislation in the autumn next year, it would involve a lengthy process of Second Reading, Committee and so forth, with several late-night sittings? This measure has a convenience-package factor in that it involves hours of debate, rather than whole days and nights.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Alison: Of course I will give way to my hon. Friend, to whom I gave way frequently in Committee.

Mr. Fabricant: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's courtesy, as I did in Committee.

Surely my right hon. Friend is not suggesting that the House could make such a decision today, given the small number of hon. Members present. It being a Friday, many hon. Members are in their constituencies. Will not the real test come in the next Session of Parliament when, we hope, the matter will be given Government time?

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend usually prefaces his interventions with "I am a very new boy in the House", or "I am not very familiar with the way things work here, but—". I am sorry that he did not do so on this occasion, for his intervention reflects his inexperience. He cannot understand what really happens on Fridays if he believes that the number of hon. Members present now represents the number who will appear from the highways and byways, the chambers and television rooms, to pour through the Lobbies.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Alison: I had better make progress. If my hon. Friend wishes to correct me on a factual point, I am happy to stand corrected without even hearing what he has to say.

A certain precondition is inherent in our attempt to crowd all the essential decisions that the Government want us to make into a single Friday sitting. The Bill may be amended further in the House of Lords; as it stands, however—having been amended in Committee—is it yet mature enough, albeit not perfect, for the House to be able to decide whether to go for full deregulation, to insert the variation suggested by the Shopping Hours Reform Council or to leave the Bill in its present form? I believe that it is mature enough and has been sufficiently amended.

I hope that this will not be taken as a personal attack, but I must draw attention to a feature of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold), who was a valued member of the Standing Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I note that my view is shared by those who were not on the Committee. My right hon. Friend suffers from a rare parliamentary malady—particularly rare among Front Benchers. She is addicted to amendments. What moth holes are to moths, what rabbit holes are to rabbits, amendments are to my right hon. Friend: she cannot have too many of them.

Dame Angela Rumbold (Mitcham and Morden) rose—

Mr. Alison: I have not yet finished my devastating attack on my right hon. Friend; let me develop it further.

My right hon. Friend put her name to 200 amendments in Committee and there must be 90 or 100 on the amendment paper today. Hon. Members may point out that she was a Minister for many years and has spent most of her parliamentary life resisting amendments; that, however, is no proof that she is not an addict. Many a schoolmistress has confiscated crisps and sweets in class, in order to devour them when the bereft children have gone home. I can tell the House in confidence that, if it were possible by a flick of a magic wand to substitute for this Bill one of my right hon. Friend's Criminal Justice Acts —she presented several in earlier days—she would cover the amendment paper with amendments to it. It would be instinctive. Indeed, this illness of hers—this addiction to amendments—has spilled over, and now affects her erstwhile Front-Bench colleague, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. He, too, has now caught the habit. He cannot resist amendments. Amendments are to be tabled in the other place to the current Criminal Justice Bill. The addiction of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden for amendments should be borne in mind when I outline the important amendments that have already been made to make the Bill a mature Bill.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I was much amused by my right hon. Friend's choice of words when expressing his views about the number of amendments that stand in my name on the amendment paper. Does he agree that it is just as well that Members of Parliament who hold the same views as I were in favour of some of the motions that were before the House earlier this parliamentary Session? I hope that my right hon. Friend can imagine the consequences of extending our debates on this Bill even further than those that we had on the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. On a more serious note, I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that it is important that this Bill, which is complex and difficult and which has caused so much distress to a large number of people, should be as near perfect as we can possibly make it and that that is the reason for the amendments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must point out that those hon. Members whose interventions are lengthy and who also expect to catch my eye later will find that long interventions are taken into consideration.

Mr. Alison: Thank goodness I am on my feet, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall apply that principle to myself and will not take too long.

My hon. Friend is right and how grateful I am to her that she did not table a large number of amendments to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. That, of course, shows that for the alcoholic—my right hon. Friend is far from that, but I use the word just as a metaphor —there is selectivity about one's particular tipple. Mercifully, my right hon. Friend's tipple is not the Maastricht Bill, but the Shops (Amendment) Bill.

Let me refer to some of the improvements that were made in Committee, in response to some of the amendments that my right hon. Friend tried to table. The size restriction for the main category of smaller shops authorised to open has been doubled from 1,500 to 3,000 ft—about the size of the Central Lobby. Sweeping improvements for the opening of Jewish shops have been accepted. Do-it-yourself shops have been enfranchised for Sunday opening, whereas earlier they were excluded.

Garden centres and farm shops can now not only open but can open to sell the full range of their goods. The self-assessment or registration procedures for smaller shops opening on Sundays, as originally proposed in the Bill, are now, thanks to what has been said by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), to be drastically revised and simplified. No statistical measure of turnover will be called for.

All these amendments, and others, have been made or tabled not only to assuage my right hon. Friend's addiction but to produce a moderate, reasonable and viable Bill. Moderation, viability and reasonableness are the hallmarks of the Bill.

I must ask right hon. and hon. Members to reflecct for a moment on the significance of the fact that the Shops Act 1950 is well over 40 years old and that serious efforts over many years to amend or replace a 43-year-old Shops Act have been unsuccessful and unrequited. The House, successive Governments of all parties and the country at large have in effect demonstrated that they are comfortable with the old ways. Like an old but comfortable coat or pair of shoes, or even an old house, we are loth to change or discard something that works and suits us, even though it could be amended and perhaps made slightly better.

It is not the sabbatarian religious fanatics who want to keep Sunday special. It is the eastender who wants a day off, as well as many millions of others, of every class and background. The traditional, quietish and different character of Sunday has wide appeal. There may be scope for a little bit of make-do-and-mend with the Shops Act, but it is the wild-eyed fanatics of commercial activism, like my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden and my hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) and for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who is the most fanatically and commercially minded of them all, who are the true revolutionaries. What they want, essentially, is a change to complete deregulation—a change as sweeping as the execution of royalty in the French revolution.

10.45 am

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): I appreciate that my right hon. Friend has not singled me out for one of his extremely charming ways of insulting people, but does he accept that some of us are in the House this morning on behalf of our constituents who have indicated, in opinion poll after opinion poll by a margin of 70 per cent., that they would like to be able to shop on Sundays and who demonstrate every Sunday that they want to shop on Sunday by going and doing just that? That is why some of us are here to talk about the issue. While I am on my feet, can I say that I should have liked to talk in Committee but that I was prevented——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. It looks as though the hon. Gentleman and others who have intervened are continuing the Second Reading debate. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) will speak to the new clause.

Mr. Alison: I am sorry that I have lured my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs), whom I would only ever want to help, into making an intervention that may have damaged his prospects of speaking in the debate. Let me remind him, however, that public opinion polls have a tatty and disreputable past. I do not believe that we need to think too much about them.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind the rights of the people who have to work in order to cater for those who want to shop on Sunday? Have they no rights to be protected?

Mr. Alison: They are, I believe, overwhelmingly the silent majority.

If we do not pass the Bill, amended or unamended, today, and reach the stage of full or partial deregulation, I do not deny that there will be a switch to Sunday shopping. It will probably be a substantial switch, but that will be the manifestation not of a pent-up demand for Sunday shopping but of the secondary importance and postponability of shopping. The possibility of Sunday shopping means that we can do things that we care about more, such as tiddly winks or boules, on days and at times that are put in front of shopping and that we postpone shopping until Sunday because shopping is not important to us.

The essential postponability of shopping will lead to a switch to Sunday shopping, but what virtually every expert expects is that if there is widespread Sunday opening, costs will rise. No more goods, overall, will be sold. There will be merely a switch from shopping on other days of the week. Volumes will remain static. Prices will go up and retailing jobs will go down. Everybody—the silent majority to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) referred, the shop workers and the general public—will be disadvantaged.

I hope that we do not agree the amendments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden. I hope that we shall settle, here and now, for the option that we prefer. My advice to the House is to stick to the old ways.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I shall not speak at great length and will conclude as quickly as I can out of regard for others who want to speak to the new clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has proved that his word is his bond. On Second Reading on 22 January, he promised to give sympathetic consideration to every constructive amendment moved in Committee. That promise was kept. Many significant amendments were approved, notably the increase to 3,000 sq ft in the size of shop allowed to open, and we now have a Bill that is the first serious attempt to reform the Sunday trading law in a sensible and practical way. While liberalising the 1950 Act, the Bill respects the special nature of Sunday and is the best possible means of tackling a mess that has become messier month by month.

In declaring my interest in the debate—I have the honour to be sponsored by the Co-operative movement—I again declare my pride in being an upholder here of a trading concept that is among the most admirable this country ever gave to the world.

By tabling the new clause, my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore has gone further than his promise on Second Reading in responding positively to amendments in Committee. He has accepted the Government's wish to offer right hon. and hon. Members three options for reforming the law: first total deregulation; secondly, the Shopping Hours Reform Council's plan for partial deregulation; and, thirdly, what the Bill proposes. The

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

Government's intention was to allow the House to vote on the three options in the autumn, possibly in November, but my hon. Friend's initiative in tabling the new clause makes it possible for us to decide the issue in this debate. That will be very widely welcomed outside the House by a public who have grown weary of the policy of dither, delay and drift. I support my hon. Friend's initiative and hope that the House will do so by an emphatic majority when we vote on the new clause.

It is no secret that each of the three options which this debate is addressing has its supporters in the Cabinet. The Home Secretary, for example, favours deregulation, the Heritage Secretary and others support variations of the SHRC plan and the Employment Secretary, among others, wants what the Bill proposes. What should unite them all, however, and every other right hon. and hon. Member, is a determination to resolve the issue now, and that is what my hon. Friend's ingenious new clause makes possible.

There is no reason whatever why we should delay until the autumn a decision that we can take today. What makes it extremely urgent to decide and to legislate now is the issue of law and order. The Government are said to be deeply concerned by the extent of public discontent with their failure to cope with increasing lawlessness in Britain today. Let me give them one reason for that discontent. Everyone knows that lawbreaking on Sunday trading by retailers is totally out of hand. Not only is the law debased but Parliament itself is demeaned by some very rich people who regard themselves as being above the law and, by implication, are contemptuous of those who make and work to uphold the law.

The chairmen of major plcs now blatantly ignore the law because it does not suit them. They will not be able to do so if the purpose of the new clause is achieved, as I hope it will be at the conclusion of the debate. I refer to people such as Sir Ian MacLaurin, David Sainsbury and Sir Geoffrey Mulcahy. A spokesman for Tesco apparently did not see the irony of his recent comment with reference to graffiti and damaged fences at one of Tesco's superstore developments when he said:

"Breaking the law is not the way to protest."

That is what this House must tell him today. Many much poorer people who fail to pay their poll tax wonder why the chairman of a plc is allowed to break the law but they are put in prison for doing so.

Lawbreaking on today's massive scale is creating unfair competition between large retailers. That is why the new clause is so important. Those who break the law are stealing market share from their law-abiding competitors. David Sainsbury publicly admitted this week that this accounted for part of his profit. He might as well have said that part of his profit was due to stealing. Waitrose, which is part of the John Lewis Partnership, is losing £1 million a week of turnover for obeying the law. How can we allow that to go on for month after month when we have the chance today to update the law and stop lawbreaking?

The Prime Minister is said to be speaking to Scottish Conservatives today about the explosion in crime and the need for better law and order.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Morris: Very briefly; I said that I want to conclude quickly.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Marks and Spencer, too, is losing a lot of money. It has good proposals that differ only in the smallest possible way from the new clause. It is to be commended for keeping the law.

Mr. Morris: What Marks and Spencer is saying is taken into account by the new clause, which allows the House to take a decision today that should not be deferred for six more months. I agree with the hon. Lady that we must look carefully and sympathetically at every proposal that is before us. Most of all, we must act quickly.

I was saying that I understand that the Prime Minister is addressing Scottish Conservatives today on the need for better law and order. Many people will think that, instead, he should be here at Westminster to vote for law and order by supporting the new clause on the good old principle that action speaks louder than words.

Lawbreaking on Sunday trading is resulting in many small shops being driven over the edge into bankruptcy. Even loss of between 5 and 10 per cent. is often enough to cause a small corner or village shop to go from profit to loss. Corner shops and small village shops situated near super-stores are losing vital turnover. They are bleeding to death from this haemorrhage of their businesses, yet I am sure that every hon. Member wants these small shops to be able to trade legally on Sunday with their entire range of goods. The recent London Economics report concluded that Sunday trading would greatly increase the pressure on small shops. Again, how can we allow such extensive lawbreaking to go on day after day, week after week, month after month and year after year, when it is making life so wretched for smaller retailers?

Hugo Young, writing in The Guardian on 4 May, highlighted how inappropriate it is that some of the large companies that are breaking the law are also major contributors to the funds of one political party. These companies "are breaking the law every Sunday and not even Mr. Gummer has been heard to utter the Phillipic appropriate to a law and order party. In fact Ministers have been blandly silent. When it suits politics, every Minister becomes an accomplice to the degrading of law."

No fewer than 256 Members of the House have signed an early-day motion demanding that

"Major national retailers set an example by closing their stores on Sundays in observance of the rule of law and in recognition of the sovereignty of Parliament."

The issue now is whether Parliament makes the laws in this country or whether the overmighty will be allowed to defy the will of Parliament. It will be quite intolerable for the Bill to be yet another victim of organised filibustering. If that happens, there will be widespread anger among people who are sick and tired of lawbreaking by the rich and powerful. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore on the new clause and I commend its purpose most warmly to the House.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I wish to speak to new clause 10 and I hope very much that we shall be able to have a separate debate on it. I do not wish to pursue the arguments about new clause 14. I suspect that a number of hon. Members believe that new clause 10 sits more appropriately with the spirit of the long title of the Bill; I am not so convinced that new clause 14 does so.

I have no wish other than to make the Bill perfect and that is why I have tabled amendments. I genuinely believe that the amendments that my hon. Friends and I have tabled will be beneficial to the general appearance of the Bill. However, the timing and placing of new clause 14 is a little suspect, so it would be better for us to concentrate on the proposals in new clause 10, which to a certain extent addresses some of the problems that the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) was trying to tackle.

The key point to new clause 10 is to consider the extension of classes of registration, in order to broaden the Bill. The new clause would allow the Secretary of State to remedy oversights in the legislation and to close loopholes, and we need to consider that idea carefully. I suspect that if the sponsors of the Bill were trying to translate their long title, it would fall into roughly the following phraseology: "This Bill closes shops on Sundays except those that sell goods and services that contribute to four main areas." The four areas named have always been recreation, emergencies, social gathering and travel, as advocated by the REST proposals. Those of us who served on the Committee, and greatly enjoyed the experience, those of us who paid a great deal of attention and were grateful to the hon. Member for Ogmore for being flexible and for accepting many of the amendments tabled by my hon. Friends and by me, accept that it is incredibly difficult to identify those areas exactly and to specify the shops, products and recreations simply by listing them, as the Bill tries to do.

We welcomed, for example, the acceptance of the principle of allowing do-it-yourself shops to open on Sundays. But why only DIY shops? What is wrong with second-hand bookshops, which represent just as much of a recreation for many of us? I shall not take up too much of the time of the House, but I shall use one example to illustrate the difficulties involved in trying to identify by shop exactly how one can provide for recreation. I rest my case on that principle.

11 am

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): My right hon. Friend is right. The moment we start listing, we get into a legislative mess. For example, the Bill proposes that a shop registered under class B will be permitted to sell live tropical fish. Will a shopkeeper be prosecuted if he sells a goldfish? That is the sort of mess that will be created if trading standards officers interpret the legislation aggressively, and that is the sort of prosecution that we shall see.

Dame Angela Rumbold: To prevent such confusion is the very purpose of the new clause. It would give the Secretary of State the power to deal with those loopholes and omissions and to say, for very good reason, "Yes, we forgot that loophole and we shall deal with it."

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I shall point out to the right hon. Lady that there is a rationale behind the approach in the Bill. It is to keep open the shops that men use and keep closed the shops that women use, so that they will stay behind and do the cooking for us, for when we get home.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I am sure that if the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) reflects on the purport of what he just said, he will realise what a sexist remark that was. None the less, I assure him that I should prefer to cook on a Sunday than to shop. As everyone knows, I have frequently declared my dislike of shopping every day of the week, and Sunday is no exception.

Mr. Burns: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the comments of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) were probably heavily influenced by an article that appeared in The Independent yesterday, saying that male Members of Parliament were prejudiced because they allowed shops for the boys to be open on a Sunday? However, the article, which was written by the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), was rather wrongly illustrated with a photograph of both a man and a woman leaving a DIY shop carrying DIY products.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding me of the article in The Independent, which I have read. Perhaps my hon. Friend should see my daughter going to pick up the cement on a Sunday, and then he would recognise that she is one of the members of my family who not only does it herself but makes DIY purchases at a time convenient for her. She is a busy full-time worker so, unfortunately, she has to choose Sundays on which to do her shopping. It should be her right to do that.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Does my right hon. Friend agree that although some politicians cannot walk and chew gum at the same time, most women, being infinitely more flexible, can certainly shop and cook on the same day, so the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) is unlikely to be disappointed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I can see no way of differentiating between male and female in either of the new clauses that we are considering.

Dame Angela Rumbold: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was simply trying to re-emphasise the point made by new clause 10, which gives the Secretary of State the power to add new classes of shop to the Bill. That is an important power, which we should not deny the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): Will the right hon. Lady correct the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), who referred to tropical fish? He was clearly misreading the Bill, probably mischievously. All that is mentioned in connection with tropical fish is the fact that they can be part of the principal goods sold, which must amount to 80 per cent. of the trade. Any other kind of product, including coldwater fish, can be sold as part of the remaining 20 per cent. Please let us not have misrepresentation.

Hon. Members: It is a red herring.

Dame Angela Rumbold: The hon. Lady has made her point, although I am not sure whether it has been well taken by my hon. Friends.

Another principle introduced by new clause 10 is the importance of keeping the law up to date. We have all seen what has happened to the Shops Act 1950, and we all know that it has been exceedingly difficult to try to introduce a new Act. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), like other hon. Members, said that there had been no opportunity to change the law, but I suspect that in 1986, when the Home Secretary of the day tried to introduce deregulation, my right hon. Friend probably chose to vote against it. It was his right to do so, but it would be incorrect to leave the House with the impression that there had been no genuine attempt by the Government to change the 1950 Act.

That Act was introduced a long time ago, and many people simply fail to recognise the huge social changes that have taken place since then. I shall not make a sexist remark, but I suspect that some hon. Members would like us to go back to the 1950s. Unfortunately for them, they cannot take us back there. It is important to remember that in 1950 only 26 per cent. of married women went to work, whereas 61 per cent. now do so. Those women have an equal right to make choices about the way in which they conduct the rest of their lives. One of the most important things that they have to do is to decide how to conduct their lives in concert with the needs of their working lives and of their families. The Bill would deprive those women of that opportunity. Therefore, it is important that we examine the exact extent of the deprivation that the Bill would impose on many women.

Mr. Burns: May I make again to my right hon. Friend the point that I made in Committee, because it is as relevant now as it was then? It is a red herring to flog to death the argument that, because of changes in the way in which society goes about its business, women cannot shop except on a Sunday and that shops have to be open on a Sunday because women are working. As I said in Committee, my wife is no different from the wives of many hon. Members. She has a full-time job and she has to look after two young children, yet she can easily do food and non-food shopping during the week and on Saturdays without needing the law to give her time to do shopping on Sundays because she cannot find any other time. It is a question of organisation rather than of changing social patterns.

Dame Angela Rumbold: That comment outlines precisely the objection to the Bill of many working women who have to work and to look after families. The Bill simply does not recognise the difficulties that women face. It is perfectly all right to say that women can arrange their lives so that they can do the shopping on Saturday, leaving them free to do housework and to cook lunch on Sunday. However, let us remember that women have just as much right to have a day when they can pursue recreational activities and it does not need to be Sunday. Why must the House declare that Sunday is the one day on which women can choose to take their time off?

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): What will the right hon. Lady say to women who will be forced to work on Sundays as a result of the deregulation that she favours?

Dame Angela Rumbold: We shall come later to some important amendments that deal with the protection of people who may have to work on Sunday. A number of women choose to work on Sunday and I should like to know what would happen to them.

Ms Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): Does the right hon. Lady agree that many women value the opportunity to work on Sundays? In my constituency there are women who do not want to abandon their children to child minders during the week. They can work in the local Asda in Rawtenstall on a Sunday while their husbands care for their children and they can earn some much-needed income for the family. It suits them very well.

I remind the right hon. Lady of the letter that I read out in Committee from a women who works in a B and Q store on a Sunday and who receives double time for that. She says at the end of her letter:

"I believe in God and I believe he knows that I am doing the best for my family."

Dame Angela Rumbold: The hon. Lady has expressed the point far more perfectly than I could. It is not only because of this issue that we want new clause 10 to be inserted in the Bill. New clause 10 leads us to future proofing, to use engineering terminology, on a number of other issues. It would allow the law to be changed when there was public demand for change without the necessity of going through the difficult and time-consuming process of introducing legislation. No hon. Member, including the promoter and the sponsors of the Bill, wants the lengthy debate and agonising that we have gone through in past years over the introduction of legislation to replace the Shops Act 1950. It is clear that the issue raises enormous and intense emotional concerns. We want on the statute book, therefore, legislation that is sufficiently flexible and that will allow Parliament to make decisions, about Sunday trading and about people's ability to use Sundays in the way that they wish, which are in concert with the time, the place and the year.

Mr. Alison: I have looked with great interest at new clause 10 and I am listening with rapt attention to what my right hon. Friend is saying about it. If new clause 10 were accepted, should we then not have to worry about any further amendments in the House of Commons? Could the Bill, with the inclusion of new clause 10, ride through to Third Reading and be amended in the House of Lords? Would it then represent the flexible and adaptable regime that my right hon. Friend has expounded? If so, and if, on condition that new clause 10 were accepted, my right hon. Friend would encourage us to go through to Third Reading and to allow the Bill to go to the House of Lords, many of us would look sympathetically at new clause 10.

Dame Angela Rumbold: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. There are a number of amendments today on which we should like to take the view of the House, as is perfectly legitimate on Report. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for saying that he might be able to support new clause 10. It is a step forward for those of us who would like greater flexibility and an extension of the powers given in the Bill. We should like to have a vote on new clause 10.

11.15 am

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I praise my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) for his hard work on the Bill and I also praise the hard work done by the Keep Sunday Special campaign and by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) and other hon. Members who worked hard to get the Bill through its Committee stage and to produce what many people felt was a satisfactory solution to the problems of Sunday trading.

I regret that the Government have not got on with their task rather more quickly. It is sad that the Government are still talking about bringing three Bills before the House and giving the House a choice some time next year although, for the past 18 months or so, many people have broken the law. The Government should give a far more vigorous lead in trying to decide which option is best.

I have a great deal of sympathy for my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore, who was faced by many amendments. As they were grouped, we could have had 35 or 36 Divisions. We could have spent nine hours simply voting on all the amendments before there was any discussion. It was sensible of my hon. Friend to table new clause 14, which has at least ensured that today's debate has taken account of some of the important issues that underlie the Bill and has avoided the whole Friday being given up to going over the minutiae of the Bill as hon. Members who did not want it to progress talked at great length.

Having done that, we must address ourselves to the crucial issues raised by new clause 14. The House must address the important question whether it is appropriate to deal with the detail of the Bill through regulations. The right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) addressed that point in new clause 10. I have a great deal of unease about regulations because they take power away from the House of Commons in terms of legislation and hand it to Ministers in the form of regulations. Legislation can be amended line by line and it is not easy to get through good things and bad things in a package. We have all seen how easy it is to put together a package of regulations and to persuade the House to support a regulation because although it does not like some things in it, it likes others. It is a little dangerous to go along the line of regulations.

However, I accept that the details of Sunday trading and changing customs and practices raise the problem of having to keep legislating. One reason why Sunday trading is now in such a mess is that the primary legislation has not been easy to amend by regulation and so has been unable to adapt. There is a problem for the House. Is it better to deal with the matter by primary legislation or by having an enabling Act and many regulations? I think that there is a case for dealing with Sunday trading by regulations. However, if we do so, we must keep the major safeguards with the House.

One of the attractions of new clause 14 is that any regulation would be subject to an affirmative resolution. New clause 10 would simply involve a prayer and we know how difficult it is even to get prayers debated and voted on. I go further and suggest to the Minister that if the Government are considering including regulations in any of their three options on Sunday trading, they should go for affirmative resolutions to change regulations and they should make the regulations amendable. That is not often done, although it was done in respect of regulations under the census legislation. The adoption of such a course would allow the House of Commons to retain a certain amount of power over the regulations, but would also give us considerable flexibility.

A second issue is addressed in the new clause—and, certainly, in my amendment (a) to which I shall come in a moment. The House is to be confronted with a problem: it will have to choose from three options as opposed to choosing either for or against what the Government propose. We all know that the procedures of the House are designed to enable us to vote yes or no. But the Government say that they will come forward with three proposals on Sunday trading. Will the Minister explain how we are to vote on three proposals?

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Maybe.

Mr. Bennett: As my hon. Friend says, maybe.

The great difficulty with such a vote is that its outcome will depend on which of the three proposals comes first. That decision may be made by the parliamentary draftsman; if it is not, the onus will be on Madam Speaker to choose which option should come first. The danger is that, unless there is a clear majority for one proposal, whichever option comes first is likely to be defeated. If we manage to get the three options voted on today, that problem may become evident.

Suppose that deregulation is the first option voted on. Those who want the present Sunday trading laws relaxed to some extent and those who want to keep Sunday special will vote against. If the middle option is voted on first, those who support deregulation and those who wish to keep Sunday special will vote against. That presents a major difficulty—unless we can design new voting procedures whereby it will be possible to establish that, say, 300 hon. Members voted for option A. 200 for option B and 150 for option C. I hope that the Government will address that major problem and ensure that, when they put the three options before us, they do not stack the decision in favour of what they want while pretending to the country that hon. Members will have a free vote on all the proposals.

Mr. Alton: I support the hon. Gentleman's line of argument. Does he recall that when the present Home Secretary was Secretary of State for Health, he had experience of using this three-card trick in relation to the human fertilisation and embryology legislation?

Mr. Bennett: I may not entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman as regards the outcome on that occasion, but I take his point that that is the problem with the way in which voting is conducted.

I hope that the House will today give the Government a clear indication that one of the options—if not two—is unacceptable and that we may thus narrow the Government's focus. The House will see that amendment (a), which stands in my name, embodies the deregulation option.

Mr. Fabricant: May I again make the point that I raised with my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) concerning the number of hon. Members present today. Are not members of the Government——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The number of hon. Members present has nothing to do with the new clause.

Mr. Bennett: I have certainly been conscious that many people in my constituency know that we are to vote on Sunday trading today; they have been writing me letters asking me to be here and I have had the day marked in my diary for a long time. I know the strength of feeling that exists in my constituency on this matter—not all of it on the same side. My constituents expect me to be here. We must accept responsibility. There are many Fridays on which we do not need to attend, but that is our choice.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I had hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not reply to the intervention of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant), on which I have already ruled.

Mr. Bennett: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We all have a responsibility as regards whether we are here for votes that take place in the House. If an hon. Member is not here, that is his fault: he cannot complain about the result.

Hon. Members will have the opportunity to choose from three options. My amendment embodies the deregulation option. Let me explain to the House that I tabled it to help my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore to get it on to the amendment paper. I instructed him to try to find someone who was an enthusiastic deregulator to put his or her name to it. My hon. Friend was unable to find such an enthusiastic deregulator.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I cannot see how amendment (a) fits in with the long title of the Bill.

Mr. Bennett: Let us put it this way: Madam Speaker selected it and, as far as I am concerned, that is that question answered. If my hon. Friend wants to pursue the matter further, he is entitled to do so. The explanation given to me was that it would help if one included regulations subject to affirmative resolution by the House.

If they have the opportunity to do so, enthusiastic deregulators should vote for amendment (a), although I may say that my hon. Friend's failure to find any hon. Member to put his name to the deregulation amendment was not for want of trying. The fact is that not many people in this country want total deregulation.

Mr. Alton: Is not it the case that, when the Government introduced their own proposals for total deregulation, they could not muster a majority in prime time—let alone on a Friday?

Mr. Bennett: I accept that argument. If we do nothing else, we should try today to establish that there is not a majority in the House for total deregulation and so get that option out of the way.

Although I tabled the amendment, I hope that deregulation will ultimately be rejected. I think that it is important that we should keep Sunday special to enable people to enjoy their religious rights. It is important that one day of the week is kept different. I am worried about the greed implicit in the fact that people continually want to go shopping. Given the tremendous commercial pressures, it is well worth having certain restrictions. I believe that keeping Sunday special has advantages for family life. I also accept the point made by the right hon. Member for Selby that seven-day trading, especially in food, only serves to put up prices. I also have sympathy with many of my constituents who live near supermarkets and who bought their property on the understanding that, on one day at least, they would be free of all the traffic and noise. It would be unfair to inflict extra trading hours on those people.

People say that we should be free to shop on Sundays. The trouble with most freedoms is that one person's freedom is someone else's restriction. I hope that the House will be able to vote today and make it absolutely clear that it would like the Government to go ahead with a Bill along the lines of my hon. Friend's Bill. If that happens, it would be logical not to wait for a Government Bill but to ask the Government to find extra time so that we can continue and complete our deliberations on a Bill along the present lines. That would enable us to stop the illegal trading that is taking place at present. It would also save the House a lot of time in the next Session, in which the Government claim that they will have a lot of work to do.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Peter Lloyd): It may be helpful if I intervene, on what I intend to be the only occasion this morning, to make some observations on what the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) almost described as this unique, not-to-be-repeated special offer of new clause 14, with added amendment (a).

I am sure that it will be helpful—if you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will allow me—if I restate briefly the Government's position on the Bill and on the way in which Sunday trading issues might best be resolved. The Government have long believed that Sunday trading cannot satisfactorily be sorted out by means of a private Member's Bill: the issues are too involved; the House is too divided; and the time available is too short. The huge number of amendments on the amendment paper bears out the correctness of that judgment, as do the further major amendments that the hon. Member for Ogmore promises will be introduced in the other place.

Although I admire the hon. Gentleman's tenacity and dedication, which have brought his Bill such a long way, and the sincerity and devotion of those advising him in the Keep Sunday Special campaign, I have to say that the Government do not believe that it will be possible to reach an effective, coherent and durable conclusion by means of his Bill or any other private Member's Bill.

11.30 am

The House must have the opportunity to compare, contrast and choose between fully worked versions of all the major reform proposals, which command support in the country and the retail trade as well as the House, with time for hon. Members and their constituents to assess and weigh what it will mean for their constituencies, and shopping arrangements locally. Putting in a complex new clause and a further amendment like this at the last moment on a Friday and saying that it will provide for the whole range of choices is not a substitute for that considered debate that the House believes is necessary before it can come to a satisfactory conclusion—despite the witty but unconvincing dismissal of the point by my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison)—especially when few hon. Members, not least those who support the other reform options, had any inkling of what would apparently be on offer today before the letter from the hon. Member for Ogmore dated Tuesday 11 May.

The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) acknowledged that the new clause does not give the House those fully worked choices. Instead, it will give the Secretary of State at some time in the future the power, if he so decided, to bring forward orders to change the categories of shops that might register to open. I do not think, therefore, that the new clause represents the generous offer that the hon. Member for Ogmore clearly believes it to be, even supposing that the order-making power of the Secretary of State was as broad as the hon. Gentleman expects the new clause to make it.

I have not had sufficient time to study the clause and take advice, but I am sceptical, like the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), about whether a Bill with a long title which says that it provides for a general prohibition on Sunday opening—and debated as such on Second Reading—could possibly be elastic enough to provide power to the Secretary of State to make a valid order allowing a majority of, let alone all, shops, to open. Of course, that will be a matter finally for the Chair, not for me.

The issue of Sunday trading has come to the House so many times in the past and has always been left unresolved. The long way round by way of a Government Bill next Session on this issue will prove to be the shortest way home, and the new clause and the further amendments promised by the hon. Member for Ogmore for another place confirm me in that view. That is why the Government will publish, in the next few weeks, their own Bill containing the major reform proposals. I cannot give a more precise date, as the Government are heavily dependent on the campaign groups coming to decisions on the details of their proposals. With the hon. Gentleman saying that there were additional important amendments to the Bill to be tabled in another place, even the Keep Sunday Special campaign has not got its Bill in its final form.

Together with the Bill, the Government will publish an objective commentary explaining what each of the options would do—who would be able to open, who would have to shut and when, and, most crucially, how the resultant legislation would be enforced.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lloyd: I will not give way to my hon. Friend, although I should like to do so. If I start to give way, I will be taking a great deal of time—and that would be unfair. When I come to the end of my remarks, and if I have not answered my hon. Friend's questions, I will take his intervention. I hope that he will understand that there will be many interventions on what the Government intend to do, which is not on the subject of this Bill, and it would be wrong for me to take up the time of the House on that matter.

Ms Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lloyd: I will not give way for the same reasons that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack). At the end, I will give way to my hon. Friend and then the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) if I have not covered their points in my remaining remarks.

I stressed that it was important that the new Act should be enforceable. Many hon. Members—I agree with them—complain that the present law is ignored. Local authorities, whose job it is to enforce it, say that it is too difficult and too expensive. I am sorry that they believe that, but I understand why they do. Whichever choice is made—whether it is now or, as the Government would advise, with a more considered opportunity by means of a Government Bill later—it is agreed by virtually everyone that it is essential that the provisions of any new Act must be readily capable of effective enforcement. The Bill that we are debating would be even more difficult to enforce than the Shops Act 1950. That legislation has proved especially difficult to put into effect.

Although the hon. Member for Ogmore no longer intends to rely on the 80:20 per cent. turnover provision for small shops, if he is successful with his amendments in another place he will still require them to register under one or other class A head. Registration would be granted on information supplied by shopkeepers. The Bill would not require local authorities to verify what they are told, but would give them a duty to enforce the law. How would local authorities enforce it? How would they know which shops they should check? To check them all would be a gargantuan job. To leave it to chance or complaint from the public or a bruised competitor would be grossly unfair and generally ineffective.

The larger stores over 3,000 sq ft would still be allowed to trade on Sunday only if 80 per cent. of turnover was derived from a specified list of products. That would mean that neither the retailer nor the local authority would know whether an offence had been committed until a certain period had passed. The law cannot operate effectively in that way. An offence must relate to a specific act on a specific date, not to a pattern of trading over time.

I do not want to labour that point and take up precious time; nor do I want to pass judgment on what the hon. Member for Ogmore and other hon. Members want to achieve. However, I have a duty to leave the House with the full realisation that if it decides to give the Bill a Third Reading today, and if the resultant Act is to be capable of enforcement and restoring respect for the law in this area, it will have to be not only amended but comprehensively recast in another place.

Therefore, I hope that the House will conclude that it would be best if this Bill were reconstructed for inclusion in a Government Bill in the autumn. It may take a few months longer, but that course will produce legislation that is fair, more effective and durable, and be much more likely to reflect the mature judgment of the House and the country.

Mr. Cormack: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because this is a crucial point for many people. Is my hon. Friend giving the House an unequivocal undertaking that there will be legislation in the Queen's speech and that that will be proceeded with before the summer recess, together with the document that he discussed? Will he be making some strong recommendations about what will happen to the lawbreakers?

Mr. Lloyd: The Government intend to introduce a Bill early in the next Session. I can confirm that we intend, well before the summer recess, to publish a Bill with the major choices in it, together with a commentary describing what those major choices would do in practice and how they would be enforced. It is vital that hon. Members and their constituents are able to see what those complicated choices would do. There needs to be sufficient time for a public debate before a Bill comes to the House.

I, together with my hon. and right hon. Friends in the Government, regard it as most important that, whichever choices we end up with, the law should be clear and capable of being effectively enforced. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South that the present situation has a corrosive effect on respect for the law. We have a major law with which many people do not agree, and those who are charged by law to enforce it—the local authorities—find it extremely difficult to do so. We want to get away from that position.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Back them up.

Mr. Lloyd: It is not a simple matter of backing them up, as the right hon. Gentleman says. The law is perfectly clear: it falls to the local authorities to enforce it, not to the Government. Therein lies the Government's major difficulty in that respect.

Ms Ruddock: The Minister presents a well-thought-out case about how to give the House real options. He uses in support of that the pressure groups. He says that they have not yet worked up their options. Will he acknowledge that all those pressure groups include in their proposals full employment protection for workers who might work on Sundays? Will he make it clear that if the choices are to be comprehensive and representative of the pressure groups, they must embody employment protection? That is a matter not of choice but of consensus.

If the Minister looks at early-day motion 1929, it will be clear to him that the number of his hon. Friends who have supported it is more than his parliamentary majority. In a free and real choice, employment protection for Sunday workers would have to be presented by the Government.

Mr. Lloyd: I accept the hon. Lady's point that employment protection and the way in which it should be incorporated into the Bill is a lively issue which is important to many people. Part of the Bill will be devoted to employee protection. Like any other part of the Bill, it will be subject to amendments and votes of the House. I believe that we shall end up with a Bill that includes a clause on employee protection which commands the support of a majority of the House. But I would be straying from the new clause if I were to expand on that.

I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Ogmore and his friends in KSS for bringing this complex Bill so far. I also thank them for the constructive and lengthy discussions that they have held with my officials in which many problems with the practical working of the Bill were identified. I am impressed by the determination with which they have set about the difficult and frustrating task of curing them. However, as I have said today as clearly as I can, there is, alas, still a long way to go. However, I am sure that the curative process could be completed well in time for the Government Bill in the autumn and, I hope, for the publication of the Government's draft Bill before the summer recess, although there are only a few more weeks for that.

Mr. Alton: The Minister has tried to convince the House that we should have a touching regard for the Government's superior ability to introduce legislation on complex issues such as Sunday trading, which mere Back Benchers cannot possibly understand. On the day after the Government—indeed, the Minister's own Department—came to the House to tell us that they got the Criminal Justice Bill wrong and they could not understand issues such as unitary fines and access to previous records, and leaving aside the community charge or compulsory testing, the Minister will forgive us for saying that his great confidence in the Government's superiority over Back Benchers is misplaced.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): Does the hon. Gentleman share my wish that the Government's proposals will include not only proposals in law but explanations? Bearing in mind the stated views of the Home Secretary, which I suspect that the Minister of State shares, and the views of the former Minister, the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold), there is clearly a great weight of opinion at the top of the Conservative party in favour of total deregulation. Does the hon. Gentleman share my anxiety that the explanations may be weighted the wrong way? Perhaps we ought to consider that carefully.

Mr. Alton: On this occasion, as on many occasions in the Committee, I am happy to be associated with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Gentleman. He has put them succinctly today. I am also worried about the motives of those within the Department who will present both the explanatory memoranda and the Bill.

The House will perhaps forgive me if I recall for a moment the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Bill. It was mentioned in the context of this Bill during an earlier intervention. Three choices were laid before the House, as they have been in new clause 14. I shall not detain the House long on this point, but, as a result of the confusion that arose, we ended up with legislation which allows abortion up to birth on the handicapped. I do not believe that it was ever the intention of the House to allow that. But that is what happens when legislation is drafted and choices are offered in this manner. People become confused.

So I hope that people will not be gulled into believing that the Government can introduce proposals that will have great clarity, but Back Benchers cannot. After all, the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 and many other Acts are the Government's legislation, not ours.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that after listening to the Minister today, people will have grave concern that he could not give an unequivocal declaration that those who would have to work on Sunday and refused to do so would be protected? He failed to give such a declaration today.

Mr. Alton: Indeed, he did. The right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden also failed to deal with that. Conservative Members talk, as she did, about choice. They say that choice is the most important thing. They elevate the idea of choice to an ideology or philosophy. Yet they fail to understand that for many people there is no choice when economic pressures are placed on them to work on Sundays. Such workers will often be women. We have heard people suggest that those of us who take a different view are misogynists. What nonsense. Many women want to be protected from having to work on Sunday and from exploitation by commercial pressures. What choice will there be for employees who want to operate their conscience if their employer says that they will either work on Sunday or lose their job? Those people will be forced to work on Sundays and we know it.

The Minister also said that it would be impossible under the terms of the Bill to deal with enforcement. There is no way in which that can be true. Local authorities up and down the land are capable of enforcement on a range of issues. I was deputy leader of the city council for some years and a member of the council for eight years. Enforcement is a day-to-day part of the work of local authorities. They will be able to enforce the legislation, just as they enforce many other requirements.

The Minister said that it would not be possible to go back and see what went on before. That is precisely what happens in cases of tax evasion every day of the week. Of course the Inland Revenue does not know that an offence is being committed at that moment. But it finds out about it and prosecutes subsequently. So the Minister's argument is ludicrous.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The Minister's argument is perfectly absurd. The Health and Safety Executive does not examine every factory, but it expects that spot checks will work. They could work equally well for the Bill.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alton: I cannot give way until I have dealt with the first intervention. The Minister was sparing in taking interventions. He took only two—one from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman and the other at the end of his remarks. That gave the game away. The Government do not want to have an open and free debate in the House today or at any other time because they know what they want—total deregulation. That is the agenda. They will try to push it through. If they cannot do it by fair means, they will do it by foul. If they can load the three options placed before the House, they will do it in that way. The Minister is grinning because he knows that that is true. He knows that if the Government can load the options, they will succeed. By chicanery and trickery, they will put their agenda through.

New clause 14 gives us a chance to deal with the three options. I hope that we will take it.

Mr. Dykes: What is the point of the Government indulging in such antics? They know full well that they cannot get full deregulation through the House.

Mr. Alton: Absolutely. The only time that the Government were defeated in the 13 years up to the last general election was on this issue. A coalition of Members from across the House said that they wished to keep Sunday as a special day. That is what the House of Commons decided to do. Will the Government accept that verdict? No. They have come back time and again, as have Members such as the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden, and tabled amendments. They have tabled 135 amendments and 13 new clauses; 99 of the amendments and new clauses are in the name of the right hon. Lady. She is a former Minister in the Home Office. She had the chance to legislate.

The Government were not prepared to accept the will of the House and they never will be. That is why they do not deserve our trust today and why we should proceed with the vote which I hope you will allow, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in due course so that we can determine the issues and they are not determined by people of whose motives we should be deeply suspicious.

Mr. Thomason: The hon. Gentleman alleged that it would be easy for local authorities to enforce the legislation encapsulated in the Bill. Does he agree that the Bill requires local government officers to investigate the books of those businesses that they want to open on Sunday in order to establish the 80:20 rule? The Bill does not specify, however, which books of which year should be under inspection. A degree of accountancy expertise would be required by the inspectors expected to enforce the legislation—expertise which is beyond their normal job specification. Although many of us may not object to the principles underlying the Bill, their practical enforcement would be almost impossible.

Mr. Alton: It will not be impossible. The 80:20 rule is clear. Shops will be able to show from their accounts of a previous year their precise trading figures. Any trading standards officer worth his salt will have no difficulty with that. The common sense of the courts will also be at play and vicarious prosecutions will not be brought purely on the basis of malice against some small shopkeeper.

At present, there are clear abuses, day by day, of the Shops Act 1950, but the Government have encouraged local authorities to turn a blind eye to the law breakers. How can hon. Members claim to be concerned about the epidemic of crime, or the standards and values of our young people when they break the law, when we are prepared to condone the breaking of a law when it is done by people for the sole reason of mercenary, monetary interest? They make huge sums of money from being able to keep their shops open.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we cannot trust the Government, because we have already had experience of what Government promises on employee rights mean not only for Sunday work, but weekday work. The Government claimed that if betting shops were open in the evening it would make no difference to the terms and conditions of the employees, if they chose not to work at night.

William Hill has now presented its employees with a contract that covers evening work. If any employee refuses to sign it—most of them are women—he or she will simply be sacked. Two people with more than 30 years of experience between them were given the alternative of signing that new contract or going down the road in search of a job. The Government have refused to take any action in that case.

Mr. Alton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing that to the attention of the House, because that is why those on the Front Bench must not be lured into voting for new clause 14.

Mr. Peter Lloyd rose—

Mr. Alton: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, who was not prepared to give way himself, in a moment. No guarantees have been given on employment protection and until there are, how anyone can vote for the Government's proposals, even if he is in favour of Sunday trading, I do not know.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Any employee whose contract is unilaterally changed by his employer and who is dismissed if he does not agree to that contract, is dismissed unfairly. There is a remedy at law, which is exactly the same for any other employee who is treated unfairly.

Mr. Alton: I am grateful for that intervention, which enables me to refer to a letter sent to me in April from the chief executive of Budgens in which he dealt specifically with the employment implications of the Bill. He stated:

"As a multiple grocer with 98 stores, Budgens plc has been one of the pioneers of Sunday Trading."

In other words, it has broken the law and is on the Minister's side. He went on:

[Mr. Alton]

"On balance, we have experienced an increase in sales of 10 per cent."

It has been doing well and making money.

"We understand that other large food retailer multiples have similar experiences.

The issue of Sunday Trading is not important to Budgens as such. Our commercial losses and gains are about equal. But, for the following reasons we believe only food stores with less than 3,000 sq. ft. sales area should be allowed to trade on Sundays:

Approximately £5 billion of market share at today's prices will shift towards the multiple food chains. This potentially represents a net loss of employment of 44,000-50,000 people due to the labour cost differential . . . as a result of much higher labour productivity in large food stores/superstores.

This is likely to cost the nation between £400-500 million in unemployment support. Social, criminal and economic problems associated with unemployment are widespread."

That is what Budgens, an ally of the Government, thinks about the Bill. That letter makes the point about the potential loss of jobs, to which the Minister also referred, very well. Added to that will be the many people who will be forced to work on Sunday who currently do not.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The hon. Gentleman has been extremely generous in giving way. He has speculated about the viewpoint of the Minister of State, as have others on both sides of the House. Is not this debate the best opportunity for the Minister to say exactly where he stands? He has addressed the House, but should not he tell us, if only by intervention, exactly where he stands on the three options?

Mr. Alton: The right hon. Gentleman asked me to give way and I will happily give way to the Minister if, in due course, he wants to intervene to make that point.

Mrs. Wise: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Alton: I shall do so in a moment, but I should make progress, consider the three options and explain my position on them.

We have the chance to sort things out with new clause 14. The first of the options, to which the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) referred, is total deregulation. I hope that the House will vote against that, as it has in the past. If we were to give the Secretary of State total power to decide which shops should or should not open on a Sunday, far too much responsibility would be passed into the hands of someone whose motives are only too well known.

The second option is that of the SHRC, which is deregulation by the back door. It proposes that all shops under 3,000 sq. ft. should be able to open at any hour on a Sunday, regardless of the goods sold, and that large shops exceeding that size must notify the local authority of which six hours they wish to open out of a specified eight-hour period. The SHRC proposals effectively provide for total deregulation. They do not offer effective employment protection, enforceable in tribunals. According to the latest statement from the Minister and his colleagues, the only employment protection to be offered in the Government Bill is for existing employees. Until we obtain clarification on that, I do not see how anyone who cares about employment protection could possibly vote for the SHRC proposal.

No employment protection is offered for workers in shops in Scotland, as there is in the Bill offered by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), which represents the third option. To achieve the third option it is therefore necessary to vote against new clause 14, if we get to that vote. I should like to explain why the House should vote accordingly.

The Bill received its Second Reading with a majority of 173. It is also worth noting that 257 hon. Members have now signed the early-day motion before the House, so there is clearly a majority view that Parliament should do something along the lines of the Keep Sunday Special campaign proposals. Those proposals have been pragmatically amended in Committee, in line with what the hon. Member for Ogmore promised the House on Second Reading.

In Committee, more than 200 amendments were given detailed consideration. The Bill was amended in a number of important respects, including allowing DIY stores to open on a Sunday and garden centres to sell their full range of goods. It provides for a wide variety of shops to be open —a total of 26 categories, which are up to 3,000 sq ft in size. Anyone who suggests that the hon. Member for Ogmore has been inflexible or unreasonable entirely misses the point. Many of us would argue that he has gone too far, but we recognise that the Bill needs to command the widest possible support and I believe that the hon. Gentleman has gone a long way to achieving that.

The Bill will not allow Sunday to become a free-for-all. When my hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) was speaking on the Noise and Statutory Nuisance Bill earlier, someone questioned his motives for doing so. I am not sure what those motives were, but he referred to Corky the cockerel. I should like to refer to another bird, the kingfisher. That bird is found on the headed notepaper of many large stores that are members of the Kingfisher Group, one of which is Woolworths.

A woman came to my surgery on Saturday last to complain about the Woolworths store in the Allerton road area of Liverpool, which I have mentioned in the House before. It chooses to break the law and is currently open on a Sunday. That causes congestion in the small terraced street in which that woman lives. During the week, she works with mentally handicapped people and she told me that she will soon develop mental illness because of the noise, rowdiness and comings and goings on the street on the one day when she expects to be able to build up her energy to face her demanding job in the next six days.

This week I have written to the Woolworths store and the Kingfisher group to ask them to comply with the law. The Bill and new clause 14 gives us the chance to sort the matter out and ensure that people living in such areas do not have their Sundays disrupted and that Sunday remains a special day. That is why the House should vote against deregulation, against the Shopping Hours Reform Council proposals and against the new clause, and leave the Bill intact.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

12 noon

Mr. Alton: No, I am about to conclude my speech—I have spoken at length. I have been generous in giving way and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to speak later in the debate.

The Minister said that the Government were not prepared to provide time for the Bill, which is to their discredit. The status of Back Benchers in this place is constantly being reduced. It seems that the only things that we can deal with are tethering ponies and other obscure issues, and the House of Commons cannot decide on an issue such as Sunday trading—which the Government have conceded should be on a free vote. Why do not the Government provide the time for the Bill, which has completed its Second Reading and Committee stage, and which will have completed much of its Report stage today?

Here is an opportunity for the official Opposition, who are also given time in the House. Regardless of whether they are for or against the Bill, I hope that they will allow the Bill to make further progress by considering the use of Opposition time—an Opposition day. We could also consider using minority party time, although there is precious little of it. If the Government are not prepared to honour the intentions behind the Bill and the overriding view of the majority of hon. Members that it should make progress, we shall ensure that Back Benchers' rights are upheld. Other parties in the House must achieve what the Government have so lamentably failed to do.

Mr. Cormack: I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who made a passionate appeal and a sensible speech. I appreciated the fact that my hon. Friend the Minister gave way to me, but I could not understand what he was getting at. It is not as if the arguments have not been well rehearsed—even over-rehearsed. It has been made abundantly clear, from the vote on Second Reading, the early-day motion signed by—I think—257 hon. Members and in so many other ways, that the manifest will of the majority of hon. Members is to amend the law on Sunday trading, but not to have total deregulation.

One talks about the dog that barked in the night—or did not. I was surprised and disappointed that my hon. Friend the Minister did not intervene when he was given the opportunity to do so and was challenged to give his personal views on Sunday trading. I suspect that today we are debating, not the Bill's Report stage, which was so well orchestrated by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), but the Government's hidden agenda—total deregulation.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, with his characteristically robust bravado, has made it clear that he supports total deregulation. He is fully entitled to that view. It also seems that my hon. Friend the Minister of State has a similar view—I should be delighted to be corrected. It is apparent that my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Mordan (Dame A. Rumbold)—who, as a previous Minister with responsibility for the subject, has to display a certain agnosticism—is also very much in favour of total deregulation. She is fully entitled to those views.

From time to time, all of us, whatever views we embrace, find ourselves in a minority. It is not the job or prerogative of the Government at any time or in any place to usurp the manifest will of the majority, which is what is happening.

Dame Angela Rumbold: It is a dangerous practice to assume that one knows the way in which one's colleagues are likely to vote. My hon. Friend is not entirely correct in his assumptions about my personal choice.

Mr. Cormack: If I am wrong, I am delighted. If my right hon. Friend, for whom I have a high regard, does not believe in total deregulation, but in something along the lines of the Bill, that is fine.

We had a full debate on Second Reading. The hon. Member for Ogmore showed exemplary flexibility in Committee and accepted amendments. I am sorry that I could not serve on the Standing Committee which was, by all accounts, a good Committee. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden said that it was a good Committee. Issues were debated at length and amendments were made. In a true non-partisan spirit, the hon. Member for Ogmore has made it absolutely plain that if the Bill leaves this House for another place, he does not expect it to return unaltered. Time and again, he has made it plain that he is happy to sit down with Ministers to discuss refinements and improvements. The Government do not have a prerogative on perfection in legislation. We only have to recall the events of less than 24 hours ago to be aware of that.

What is the obstacle? In another place, there are many Members on both sides of the House and on the Cross Benches with enormous experience who can contribute to the Bill. I am not talking about the Bench of Bishops; my views do not stem from a sabbatarian stance—far from it. I do not want, and never have wanted, a high street Sunday. I do not want Saturday to be replicated. [HON. MEMBERS: "Stay away."] My hon. Friends tell me to stay away. In doing so, they show a total misunderstanding of what I am trying to say.

As the hon. Member for Mossley Hill made clear when he quoted the letter from his constituent, if there is a high street Sunday that replicates Saturday, one cannot stop the world and get off. If one lives in the heart of a city or town, one is stuck there, and surrounded and enveloped by the activity. I remember a Good Friday in Wolverhampton soon after I moved to the midlands nearly 25 years ago. I was so astounded by the frenetic commercial activity, which was so different from the atmosphere in my native Lincolnshire, that I rammed my car into the one in front—it was a costly Good Friday. A high street Sunday would result in many such incidents.

Today we have been given an opportunity—ingeniously devised by the hon. Member for Ogmore, assisted by the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett)—to exercise choice. The House can pronouce on the three choices—total deregulation and the two forms of amendment. The hon. Member for Mossley Hill, with his characteristic skill, took us through the details of the choice; I shall not attempt to repeat what he said, as it would be superfluous to do so.

We have a choice. There is no problem about hon. Members not knowing about today's business. Of course, it is commonly understood that one does not know the nature of specific amendments until close to the day on which they are to be debated. We constantly live our lives in ignorance of what is to happen in the week ahead. We do not know the business for the following week until the previous Thursday and many of us have to adjust our timetables accordingly. But that does not apply to Fridays. We have known for a very long time that this day would be largely devoted to the issue of Sunday trading, and we have known for a few days that this crucial new clause existed. There is no reason, therefore, why the Lobbies should not be full at 2.30 pm or thereabouts. I believe that it would be wrong of the Government to insist on frustrating the will of the House——

Mr. Fabricant: Nonsense.

Mr. Cormack: It is not nonsense. My hon. Friend, who is a near neighbour of mine, is an expert on the subject of nonsense. We know what the subject before us is——

Mr. Fabricant rose——

Mr. Cormack: My hon. Friend served on the Committee, and if he will just contain himself for a moment I will point out to him that no Member of the House, present or absent, has any excuse for not knowing the business today.

Mr. Fabricant: I thank my near neighbour for giving way. I said "nonsense" because we have known for only three days that there was to be a choice between these three areas. I also said it because my hon. Friend claimed that the Lobbies could be full. There are 651 Members of Parliament. Does my hon. Friend seriously claim that they will all be in the Lobbies? I think not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has repeatedly intervened on this and related subjects this morning. I hope that he will not do that any more.

Mr. Cormack: Every Member knows the business of the House for the day and makes his or her choice accordingly. As to the nature of the amendments, hon. Members can look at the amendment paper and see what amendments are being tabled—and they can adjust their diaries, if they feel it necessary to do so.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I hesitate to intervene on this fraternal strife, but the hon. Gentleman has said that it would be superfluous to go through the alternative procedures when we come to vote. But surely those procedures are an incomprehensible dog's breakfast? If hon. Members want to secure what I take it the hon. Gentleman himself wants—restricted Sunday trading—they must vote against the new clause moved by the promoter of the Bill, who may have to vote against it himself. What sense is there in that?

Mr. Cormack: As I said when I paid the hon. Member for Ogmore a compliment, he is adopting an ingenious procedure, in response to requests from various parts of the House. He is doing it to tell the Government that they do not need to waste their time with the three options, because the House can pronounce on them this Friday.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Cormack: I am sorry, but I must get on. I promised to be brief, and I have already gone on for far too long —[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—because I have given way to those who have intervened.

The Government are always saying that they need more time to get their legislation right. Here is a marvellous opportunity for them to allow a subject to be dealt with in a private Member's Bill. To claim that the subject is too complicated is an insult to the House. One has only to look at many of the issues that have been decided in the past by private Members' Bills—the abolition of the death penalty, the creation of conservation areas—to recognise that matters of great moment and of fundamental importance to many people have frequently been decided in this way.

Hon. Members have referred to workers' rights. I wholly accept the Government's wish for proper protection in legislation for workers, but if we move towards total deregulation it will be increasingly difficult to maintain that stance. Only the other day, I was told by a member of Her Majesty's Government, whose driver's wife works in a branch of Sainsbury, that, in spite of Sainsbury's frequently proclaimed assertion that it does not wish to interfere with the freedom of conscience of its workers, the women had come under intolerable pressure —so much so that it had been acknowledged in a letter from the company's head or regional office.

This would happen increasingly, and over time it would have the inevitable consequence of cutting away the very foundations on which the village and corner shop economy is built. We would be destroying an element of the very choice in which we frequently proclaim we believe, to the disadvantage of our constituents, whether they live in villages or in small streets served by the corner shop. Total deregulation would spell the slow decline and death of most of these shops.

Hon. Members have mentioned the lawbreakers. One of the reasons why I regret the Government's refusal to allow the Bill to proceed is the fact—the Minister acknowledged his own unease on this score—that so many people are breaking the law. All over the country, large stores are opening in flagrant violation of the law. It is no excuse to blame local authorities. We have not heard from the Dispatch Box the ringing denunciation of this lawbreaking that we should have heard. It is inexcusable and it creates perverse double standards for those who talk of law and order and the need to enforce them.

If for no other reason than that, I ask the Minister to think again and allow the Bill to go to another place to be further improved. My hon. Friend can play a part in improving it, so that we can have something on the statute book well before next Christmas, thereby doing something positive and definite to stop a pernicious kind of lawbreaking.

Ms Janet Anderson: I wish to commend new clause 10 to the House. The Report stage of a private Member's Bill is the last place to be holding a debate such as this, on new clause 14. It is much more a Second Reading matter as it goes to the heart of the Bill.

New clause 10 is a genuine attempt to amend the Bill, and is much more in keeping with it. It does not go as far as new clause 14, but it would introduce a welcome element of flexibility by allowing more classes of shop to register under clause 3 and by altering some of the current requirements that might, in the fullness of time, seem unnecessary or irrelevant.

If the sponsers of the Bill were forced to translate the long title into plain English, they would probably say, "This is a Bill that closes shops on Sundays, unless they sell goods or services that contribute to recreation, emergencies, social gatherings or travel"—the REST proposals— "and provides protection for Sunday shop workers." Most of us agree about the necessity for that protection.

That is not quite the approach that the Bill takes in practice. No doubt for good legal reasons, the sponsors of the Bill have not tried to insert into law tests based on whether shops satisfy the REST proposals. Instead, they have set out all the goods and types of shop which they think meet the various REST proposals. That presents a problem. Because the REST proposals are not defined in a detailed way, it is hard to see how some shops have been fitted into them but others rejected. For example, DIY shops are recreational, but second-hand book shops are not. I endorse the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), as set out in the article in The Independent yesterday to which reference has already been made. She said:

"Given the number of men on the committee (18 out of 21) it was perhaps predictable that various exceptions have been proposed to the general ban on Sunday shopping. 'Boys' shops' such as DIY stores and motor spares shops will be allowed to open; supermarkets and the clothes shops that women want will not. It appears that a woman's place is in the home, at least on Sundays, while a man's is out at the shops, down the pub, up a ladder or under a car. Is it not also a case of double standards for many male MPs to favour more Sunday sporting events but not more Sunday shopping?"

It is essential that the law, if it is not to be brought into disrepute, keeps up to date with what people want, and remains enforceable. New clause 10 gives the Secretary of State power to add new classes of shop to the Bill. It will allow the Government of the day to remedy any oversights that we have not picked up. Without it, it is entirely possible that we shall face a whole new set of private Members' Bill adjusting this one as oversights are remedied.

It is possible that the Bill will have unexpected loopholes. We know that the Shops Act 1950 has brought a great deal of income to lawyers down the years, as they have pored over it looking for new ways to stretch its meaning. Almost by definition, we would not expect to discover loopholes today, or we would have closed them. If the Bill contains loopholes—it would be a brave Member of Parliament who declared any but the most simple legislative measure free of such loopholes—the new clause gives the Government of the day the power to close them.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I raised this point earlier, but I did not get a satisfactory answer. The sale of wet fish, which is covered by the 1950 Act, is important to Grimsby. Is new clause 10 the way to allow what I want to be allowed—the sale of wet fish on Sundays?

Ms Anderson: I agree with my hon. Friend. As he has said, with all the amendments, concessions and compromises, the Bill has become something of a dog's breakfast. Those of us who support the SHRC proposals, are constantly misrepresented as being in favour of deregulation, but we are not. We are in favour of legislation based on size of outlet rather than on type of goods sold. Any Bill based on the latter is bound to be anomalous, as my hon. Friend has rightly said.

Mr. Thomason: Does the hon. Lady agree that it is a strange anomaly that, under new clause 14, spare parts for motor vehicles can be sold, but motor vehicles themselves cannot be?

Ms Anderson: That is a good example of the mess that the Bill has become.

One of the most obvious problems of the Shops Act 1950 is that it has failed to keep up not just with changes to retailing but with changes of life style in our wider society. The Act was already pretty outdated when it came into being. It was largely a consolidating measure and much of it can be dated back as far as 1936. Therefore, it is hardly surprising that it cannot cope with the huge changes in the way that we work and shop. In 1950, 26 per cent. of married women worked. Now, 61 per cent. work, even though they are still largely responsible for the shopping. I speak as a working mother who is still largely responsible for the shopping. That is not to say that my husband is not willing to do the shopping. He is, but he generally gets it wrong.

Mr. Stern: As one who has overcome that barrier, may I recommend a course of action to the hon. Lady? If she allows him enough practice, he will eventually get it right.

Ms Anderson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that advice.

DIY shops, video shops, garden centres and out-of-town shopping developments did not exist in 1950. Shop workers were largely full-time workers; now they are largely part-time workers. Whether we like it or not, religious observance by Christians has declined, while that by Muslims, whose holy day has no legal recognition, has increased.

Mr. Fabricant: Does the hon. Lady agree that in Scotland, where there are no Sunday trading restrictions, more people attend church on Sundays than is the case in England, where there are Sunday trading restrictions?

Ms Anderson: The hon. Gentleman is right. Attendance at places of worship on Sunday in Scotland is higher than it is in England and Wales, and shops there have been allowed to open for many years.

The new clause, as the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) said earlier, is an attempt to give the Bill what engineers would call future-proofing. If whole new sectors of shopping come into being, the Bill can be amended by statutory instrument to take account of those changes.

Perhaps most importantly, the new clause will allow the law to be changed when there is public demand for change, without Parliament having to go through the difficult and time-consuming process of introducing new legislation. The sponsors of the Bill might be a little suspicious of that argument, although they claim to have public opinion on their side, but the actions in recent months of hon. Members on both sides of the House who support the Bill make the case for incorporating the new clause, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) showed when he predicted that, if the Bill goes further, there will be more amendments to it.

The main argument in the behind-the-scenes lobbying that has gone on in the corridors, tea rooms and bars in recent weeks is that the Bill is now a compromise and has caught up with the overwhelming public desire to open DIY stores. At one level, that shows a welcome flexibility by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore and his colleagues, but it also confirms that, even in a short time, views about what should or should not be opened can be changed. Think how much could change in 43 years if we had to wait that long before the House got to grips with Sunday trading again.

[Ms Anderson]

My hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) will be putting the views of USDAW at great length later if she catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I shall take the opportunity to place on the record the position of the Transport and General Workers Union and GMB. The TGWU recommended that the Bill be opposed on Second Reading because of fears that it would be too restrictive. It is now carrying out an extensive consultation with its membership to get a clear and comprehensive picture of views on working on Sunday. The union expects that its position will be resolved at this summer's biennial conference.

The GMB has said that it accepts that public pressure for Sunday trading will result in a change in law. Its aim is to protect its members by supporting a limit on the number of hours that shops can open on any day of the week. No worker should be forced to work on Sundays and a refusal to work should not lead to a setback in the worker's prospects. Premium payments should be made in recognition of the special nature of Sunday working.

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): My hon. Friend may not know that the position of my union, Manufacturing, Science and Finance, has recently been declared identical with that of the two unions that she mentioned. It has been decided that, as long as provision is made for adequate worker protection—whether by statute or through traditional trade union channels—MSF agrees broadly with the position of the other two unions. It has also been decided that, unless such provision is enshrined in primary legislation, no majority for any other measures will be possible in the House. I have a good deal of experience of such matters, having worked regularly on Sundays before I became a Member of Parliament—that is, when I had a proper job.

Ms Anderson: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention; my position is the same.

Several of our major trade union colleagues have recognised that flexibility is needed, and that whatever legislation is presented should not be too restrictive. That is the aim of new clause 10, and I commend it to the House.

12.30 pm

Mr. Lord: As almost everything has been said already, I shall try to be brief.

I was disappointed by the Minister's speech, which I did not consider particularly helpful. I thought it rather patronising, which was surprising in his case; I also thought that, in view of all the effort that has gone into the Bill, his approach was very negative. We have been considering this subject since 1986, and it really is time that we got on with it. The Home Secretary's speech yesterday suggested a fresh attitude—a new willingness to accept reality and make progress. That was not true of the Minister's contribution. Moreover, it seemed to reveal his own views—although they have not yet been confirmed; it will be interesting to find out what they are in the end. It is taking time to tease out hon. Members' views.

It is difficult for me to talk about my right hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) when she is not in the Chamber, but I have talked to her more than once about the problems of the legislation. At the time, she gave the impression that she was relatively unbiased, and was trying to find the best possible solution. Now she seems to be one of those most rabidly in favour of deregulation. When challenged by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), she said that that was not the case, and implied that she might not favour complete deregulation—which, surely, must mean that she favours some kind of regulation. If so, I welcome her attitude, but I hope that the i's will be dotted and the t's crossed in due course.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been pressed several times to give my view. I did not want to take up the House's time with something that is irrelevant to the Bill and the House's decision on it; let me say, however, that—as many of my hon. Friends know, along with all my constituents who have written to me on the subject—Scotland, in my view, has the best arrangement. That is none the less subordinate to my overriding objective of securing effective, enforceable legislation that reflects the considered view of Parliament. I do not believe that this Bill will do that, which is why I made the speech that I made. However, it will be for the House to decide, on a free vote.

Mr. Lord: I understand the Minister's position: he is in favour of total deregulation. That, basically, is the decision that the House will have to make, however we wrap it up. Either we want total deregulation, and are prepared to risk Sunday's becoming just another day of the week, or we must accept that the House has a responsibility to produce some kind of legislation—however difficult it may be—to preserve Sunday as it has been preserved over the years by our forefathers, who were perhaps much wiser in this regard than we seem to be now.

In a sense, new clause 14 sums up the issue. Others have already spoken, so I shall not go into much detail; but it seems to me that either we want to keep Sunday special—a stance that is addressed by the Bill—or we want deregulation. The alternatives involved in deregulation are total deregulation—that is the honest description, and the Minister has been honest—and partial deregulation. I believe that both would result in total deregulation, one way or the other. One alternative makes no bones about it, suggesting that we should clear the decks without troubling to work out the complications; the other would allow all shops measuring less than 3,000 sq ft to open on Sundays, and others for six hours a day.

This Chamber measures approximately 3,000 sq ft. The provision encompasses the vast majority of shops in the country. Under partial deregulation, such shops will be able to open on Sundays regardless of what they sell, while all shops—regardless of size—will be able to open for six hours. Six hours is not far short of a complete trading day. Technically, it is two hours short of a complete trading day, but how long will it be before trading is extended to eight hours a day?

The fact that all shops of the size of the House of Commons would be able to open and that all shops, regardless of size, would be able to open for six hours on a Sunday really means that partial deregulation will result in total deregulation. The two options are not, therefore, what they seem to be. Either we vote for the Bill of the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) or we vote for deregulation in one form or another.

Dr. Liam Fox: Does my hon. Friend accept that all hon. Members know the business of the House and have a duty to be here, if they think that it is important to be here?

None the less, a clearer view of the will of the House would be achieved under the proposals outlined by the Minister this morning. We should then have all the summer to consider the proposals and then take a vote, with more Members being aware by the autumn of what they are.

Mr. Lord: I disagree entirely with my hon. Friend. Any hon. Member who is interested in a subject as important as this could have been here today. I accept that a small minority have engagements that it would have been impossible for them to cancel, but all of us have to be fairly light on our feet in the House of Commons and able to respond, often within hours, to various issues. Most hon. Members could have made time to be here and should have been here.

My hon. Friend also referred to the Government's proposals. The Minister told us this morning that the Government do not intend just to introduce legal proposals; there will be explanations of the effect of those proposals. I do not wish to impugn the Government's motives, but when one moves to explanations rather than pure facts there is always room for manoeuvre, depending upon the individual's point of view. We have had a lot of time to think about this issue.

By and large, hon. Members have made up their minds about the matter. If they have not made up their minds about it by now, they jolly well ought to have done. There has been ample opportunity to go into it in great detail. By now, therefore, they should have decided what their constituents want and what they believe they want on behalf of their constituents.

In Committee, we also dealt comprehensively with the issue of Sunday opening before Christmas. It was suggested that all shops should be allowed to open on the four Sundays before Christmas. This was regarded by the majority of the Committee as a matter of principle, where there was no room for negotiation. The Committee decided that there was room for movement on other aspects, but on the issue of shops opening on the four Sundays before Christmas it felt that it could not budge. It is a Christian holiday. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South, I am not sabbatarian about the matter, but it is an important one. It is interesting that my hon. Friend also mentioned Good Friday. It is a long time since we all had a holiday on Good Friday. It is also interesting that we are thinking of introducing a new national holiday and inventing a name for it. But we once had a name for a bank holiday, and that name was Good Friday. Sadly, Good Friday now means business as usual.

If we want to accommodate the extra shopping that is done before Christmas, there is a simple way of accommodating it; by allowing shops to open later in the evening from Monday to Saturday. There is no reason why that should not be allowed. In that way, it would be possible to accommodate the extra shopping required in the weeks before Christmas.

Even though life is hectic and busy for shops in the weeks before Christmas—they want their tills to ring and to make as much money as they can—we must remember that life is also hectic for those who work in shops. They are just as entitled to have their Sundays protected and preserved in the run-up to a Christian holiday as they are at other times of the year.

If there is talk about opening on four Sundays before Christmas, why not make it six Sundays, or 10 Sundays? What not open on Sundays during the January sales, or in the run-up to Easter or in midsummer? Once the principle is breached, there is no knowing where it might lead.

Mr. Alton: The hon. Gentleman has rightly referred to the position of shop workers. Is he aware that if they were to resort to the employment tribunals that were mentioned by the Minister in his speech, the prospects of their being reinstated would be pretty bleak? The figures show that only 1 per cent. of all those who go to a tribunal are reinstated, that only 10 per cent. are able successfully to fight their cases in tribunals and that they receive, on average, £1,700 in compensation. In other words, for 99 per cent. of shop workers, there will be no chance of reinstatement and for 90 per cent. of them there will be no compensation.

Mr. Lord: I agree very much with the hon. Gentleman. This is a minefield. Whatever is written in contracts and whatever assurances are given, pressure builds up and it is easier for someone who wants to keep their job to acquiesce and to accept that pressure. Hon. Members will never hear of the hundreds of thousands of people who have been pressurised into doing something that they do not want to do because they do not want to complain or permanently to damage the atmosphere of their workplace.

It is often said that this matter is complicated and that, in trying to draft legislation we are almost certain to get it wrong—if only slightly. I accept that it is extremely difficult to make such legislation watertight, but is that any reason for taking the easy way out and abandoning all legislation, because that is what is being urged on us? I am sure that it is not. If we believe that Sunday should be a special day, surely it is worth getting our intelligent and highly paid civil servants to redraft the law so that it fits what we want to do to preserve Sunday.

That, in effect, is what the hon. Member for Ogmore has done under this private Member's Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South referred to huge changes in our life that have been made by private Member's Bills. An enormous amount of effort has gone into the Bill, and I believe that it is the will of the House —with the exception, perhaps, of the Government Front Bench—to preserve our Sundays. Here is the vehicle to do it and we must not waste the opportunity.

Supporters of the Bill are not narrow minded. We are anxious to protect and preserve what is good in our national life. There is so much upheaval now in our country on every possible front. Surely we should fight for stability and to keep in place what we have had for such a long time.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Lord: No, I am not giving way any more——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I do not want unduly to curb the hon. Gentleman, but he is now making a more general speech suitable to, say, a Second Reading debate rather than to the two new clauses under consideration.

Mr. Lord: I appreciate that, and I apologise if I have strayed slightly from the straight and narrow.

To most people, Sunday still is an oasis in this hectic life of ours, and future generations will never forgive us if we let our Sunday go.

Mrs. Wise: We heard how anxious the Minister was that the House should have a chance to compare and contrast several fully worked-out choices. That is a novel doctrine of legislation and I wonder whether he intends to extend it to other controversial issues. For instance, will we have several fully worked-out choices on the future of British Rail—a matter which is equally controversial and over which the controversy crosses the Floor? I suspect not. The Minister's expression tells me all. That shows that the Minister is talking now about comparing and contrasting because the Government have no confidence in getting through the House the measures that they want.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has been generous to the opponents of the Bill in new clause 14. Despite my surprise and misgivings, I realise that that generosity is intended to benefit the whole House: hon. Members can debate the options to save the Government the trouble and the time of waiting until the autumn. I appreciate my hon. Friend's motives.

Dr. Fox: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Wise: No. I have not intervened and I am conscious of the time.

I am conscious of the fact that this new clause offers a succinct means of discussing the issues that are raised in all the other amendments. I trust that even the opponents of the Bill would agree that the amendments would not be necessary if the new clause were passed.

12.45 pm

The new clause allows the Shopping Hours Reform Council's proposals to be brought before the House and I shall examine something of what that means. First, there is the six hours of trading. We are told that our legislation is the slippery slope. We are asked, "Why not this sort of shop? Why not that sort of product?" Well, why not seven hours or 10 hours? The six-hour provision is certainly the top of a slippery slope, because there is no principle whatever behind it.

The Bill rests on the desire of the House—and, I believe, of the country—not to have a high street Sunday. As the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) said, we do not want to replicate Saturday on a Sunday. That is the principle of the Bill, and the schedules and other devices are the means to carry it out. They have a perfectly logical basis.

The Shopping Hours Reform Council's proposals on worker protection are interesting. We have heard from some hon. Members, including from the Opposition Front Bench, that there is common ground that there should be full worker protection. That is not so. It depends whom one considers to be workers. There are even amendments before us today to remove anyone engaged in any management task from all employee protection. In its unadulterated form, the Bill would protect all grades and types of employee, including managers. And why not? What is it about management staff in retailing that makes them neither need nor deserve support and protection? I speak now for my union and as the president of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers as well as the Member of Parliament for Preston. I make it clear that all grades and types of staff join trade unions because they realise that they need protection, and the House should realise that, too.

The Shopping Hours Reform Council offers no protection for workers in Scotland, yet they need it even more than workers in England, because there is more Sunday trading in Scotland. The Bill, as it emerged from Committee, extends employee protection to Scotland. Everybody who is genuinely in favour of employee protection should vote for the Bill on that ground if on no other. Certainly all Scottish Members with the interests of shop workers at heart should vote for it.

The Shopping Hours Reform Council would not protect Sunday-only workers. That is deplorable, but, of course, it is part of the pattern of the results of deregulation and partial deregulation, which increase casualisation and increase the number of workers with no rights, no security and no status who work for peanuts. The fact that the Shopping Hours Reform Council would exclude those people from protection is typical. There would also be no guarantee of any protection for remuneration. The Bill enshrines the principle of double time on a Sunday and that provision went through Committee unanimously, without amendment. If members of the Committee were so worried about the Bill, why did not they table suitable amendments then? They accepted the provisions for employment protection and the Bill, unlike new clause 14, is specific about double time. In case anybody thinks that that is a daring and innovative idea, I must tell the House that double time in retailing on a Sunday was guaranteed in law until 1986. Nor was it removed from the law because of any pressure from employers or from the public. The Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers continues to have agreements with various employers which still enshrine double time. Of course, there is some Sunday working in retailing even without Sunday trading. There is stocktaking and preparatory work to do and that is why agreements mention pay and protection on Sunday.

What would happen if the deregulators got their way or if the Shopping Hours Reform Council got its way? Retailing is already a cut-throat business, so the main brunt of the competitive pressure would fall on the work force. That is why it is vital to have protection spelt out and vital not to have a high street Sunday which would even brush aside legal protection. I am not interested in lip service to worker protection. I am interested in real protection, in money, in the voluntary principle and in the protection of all grades of workers throughout the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) talked about the Transport and General Workers Union and the General, Municipal, Boilermakers and Allied Workers Union. She says that they do not like the Bill and that they are consulting their members. It is a pity that they did not consult their members before they gave advice to hon. Members. We in USDAW have just had an annual delegate meeting with representatives of every branch of the union, which is by far the largest union in retailing, and it was solidly behind the Bill. We are the union which, above all others, organises shop workers. We understand retailing and we know what would happen with a high street Sunday.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Wise: No. The hon. Member has intervened repeatedly this morning and never to good account.

Mr. Fabricant: I want to redeem myself.

Mrs. Wise: The hon. Gentleman is beyond redemption.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) was even more generous than my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore in tabling his amendment and I understand why perfectly. I will certainly protect his reputation.

The deregulators do not even pay lip service to workers' protection; they are for "anything goes" and they welcome the Prime Minister's statement that the present law of the land is bizarre. It ill becomes Ministers to complain if local authorities find it difficult to enforce the law when they create such an atmosphere.

I will not resist the Second Reading of the new clause, but I will certainly resist the amendment and I will certainly fiercely resist any suggestion that the new clause should stand part of the Bill, as should anybody who is interested in keeping Sunday special and who has any concern for women workers who overwhelmingly staff our shops. When some people in the House talk about women, they seem to have a blind spot for the women who work on the check-outs, who fill the shelves and who do not want to work on a Sunday, but who want proper pay and conditions for the other days of the week. Nobody can tell us that there is no time during the week, with 12-hour shopping days in many cases, to shop. Anybody who can organise his or her time properly can find time to shop.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise), who said that, as president of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, she could confirm that USDAW was the largest union of shopworkers. What she did not tell the House was that nine shopworkers out of 10 choose not to be members of USDAW.

We have been asked to state our interest in this debate. I can do so succinctly. I believe in the maximum freedom of choice. I also believe that the burden of bureaucratic intervention on industry and commerce should be reduced. Unfortunately, the Bill seeks to increase the level of bureaucratic intervention in commerce. Much more important, it seeks to deny freedom. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) said that his wife was quite capable of organising her week so that she did not have to shop on Sunday. Good for her. No one is asking her to shop on Sunday. But I do not believe that the fact that Mrs. Burns does not want to shop on Sunday is a reason why I should not shop on Sunday or a good reason for preventing supermarkets from opening on Sunday.

We have listened this morning to some of the most arrant twaddle possible. We have heard the supermarkets described as the lawbreakers, as if every other retailer behaved legally on Sundays. I remind the House that 95 per cent. of shops that open on this coming Sunday will be trading illegally. It is not just the supermarkets that trade illegally: every corner shop that sells a can of baked beans, a packet of cod fish fingers—no doubt made in Grimsby——

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marshall: —or even a packet of sugar, or that rents out a video is trading illegally. We are also talking about every DIY centre that sells Miss Rumbold some cement and every garden centre that is open this Sunday. It is quite wrong of hon. Members to say that they are fighting a battle against the lawbreakers. They are selective as to the lawbreakers against whom they are fighting the battle and they are ignoring the fact that the first shops to break the law on a Sunday were not the supermarket chains but small traders and that the supermarkets have merely caught up——

Mrs. Ann Winterton: If I follow the hon. Gentleman's argument, he will welcome the fact that he has before him a Bill on which he can vote which will prevent the delay in a new law being enacted and enforced and will prevent the free-for-all before Christmas, which is such a disgrace to the Government whom I support, who purport to be the Government of law and order.

Mr. Marshall: I do not welcome the Bill because it is bureaucratic. What is worse, it seems to embody an obsessive dislike of supermarkets, as if sin sat on the supermarket shelf.

We should welcome the fact that we have one of the most efficient retailing industries in the world. I should like at this point to do something that I have not done since I became a Member of the House and pay tribute to the Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir. E. Heath). The Retail Prices Act 1964, which my right hon. Friend introduced, has enabled Britain to have such an efficient retailing system.

Our supermarkets offer cheap prices and wide choice. The Bill would close them on Sundays. New clause 10 offers them a ray of hope. Some of the supporters of the Bill are the self-satisfied, the sanctimonious, the well paid and the well fed, who seek to make life less convenient and more expensive for my constituents.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman is a passionate supporter of Sunday working. Does his support extend to Sunday working by Members of Parliament? Would he advocate that the House of Commons should normally work on a Sunday?

Mr. Marshall: Those of my constituents who know me well know that I frequently work in my constituency on Sunday morning, afternoon and evening. Many organisations will confirm that I am happy to attend meetings on Sundays if I am asked to do so.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentleman is making a rod for his own back.

Mr. Marshall: I am not a part-timer like the hon. Gentleman, who suddenly appears at 12.30 pm on a Friday. He is such a part-timer that he refuses to serve on Standing Committees and lectures the rest of us on the fact that we do too much work.

Mr. Skinner: As a matter of fact, I was on a Standing Committee only last week, so the hon. Gentleman is totally wrong. As for being a part-timer, I voted in 98 per cent. of the votes in the last Session of Parliament and in 96 per cent. of the votes in another Session. I wish that the hon. Gentleman would check his record, which is probably similar to the average for other hon. Members—about 50 per cent. He should not talk to me about being a part-timer when he is lining his pockets with other jobs.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) continues, I hope that we will return to the two clauses under consideration and that matters will not get too personal. It would not be unparliamentary to discuss personal matters, but I do not like it. We should be discussing issues, not personalities.

1 pm

Mr. Marshall: I agree, Madam Deputy Speaker. Some people incite one into straying down the ways of misguided thoughts—I will try not to yield to temptation. To err is human: to forgive, divine.

Recently, I visited two shops in my constituency. One was Food Giant, which would be closed on Sundays by the Bill, and the other was 7-Eleven, which would be allowed to trade on Sundays. That is why I regard the new clause as important. The House may like to know the cost of some of the commodities on that shopping expedition. I wanted to buy a pint of semi-skimmed milk, because I am conscious of the need to keep weight under control. It cost 25p at Food Giant and 38p at 7-Eleven. I wanted to buy a loaf of Mother's Pride bread—it was 29p at Food Giant and 71p at 7-Eleven. I wanted to buy some Nescafe—it was £1·29 at Food Giant and £1·79 at 7-Eleven.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) thought that his fish would not be mentioned. But I wanted to buy some fish fingers made in Grimsby. They were £1·15 for 10 at Food Giant and £1·89 at 7-Eleven —a difference on first-class Bird's Eye fish fingers of 74p. That is a high rate of valued added tax to impose to keep the Sunday sabatarian conscience. I thought that if I were eating all that food, I should brush my teeth. What was the cost of oral hygiene? A tube of Aquafresh was £1·29 at Food Giant and £1·95 at 7-Eleven.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Can I buy shares in Food Giant?

Mr. Marshall: Food Giant is not the most prosperous retailing group, but it is getting a free plug this morning. For a basket of well-known basic commodities and foodstuffs, the cost at Food Giant was £14·28. That shop would be closed down by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell), who talked about the need for pensioners, single-parent families and widows to have a better deal. He would close down Food Giant at £14·28 and give 7-Eleven a licence to open at £19·56. I suggest that the cost of all that to the average family could be as much as £500 a year. That is from an hon. Member who objects to the imposition of VAT on fuel. The cost of the Bill to many families would be much greater than the cost of the imposition of VAT on heating and lighting.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: The hon. Gentleman voted for that.

Mr. Marshall: I know that the hon. Lady's husband voted against the imposition of VAT on fuel but she did not vote against it, so she is caught out by her own intervention.

It is accepted by people that supermarkets are relatively inexpensive and popular. Indeed, on Sunday, more people will shop in the supermarkets of England than listen to the vicars of the Church of England preach. We must ask ourselves what right we have to say to the people of the United Kingdom that they are wrong and we are right.

Lord Randolph Churchill, the great-grandfather of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), told the Tory party to trust the people. Those of us who support a liberalisation of the law say, "Trust the people; the people will decide whether they want to shop on Sunday." They should be given that choice.

Those who say that they want to change the law and keep Sunday special forget that Sunday will not be kept special by legislative fiat. Sunday will be kept special out of conviction. When I was young, my family and I used to walk around the streets of Dundee on a Sunday because that was what we wanted to do. We did not want to stop in the shops that could legally trade on Sunday in Scotland.

When I go around my constituency tomorrow afternoon, I shall see walking around Hendon Jewish family after Jewish family. Why do they walk around Hendon as a family on a Saturday? It is not because a law of the land says that they cannot go and shop. It is because, out of conviction, they do not want to shop on Shabbat. That is surely the way to keep Sunday special.

The way to keep Sunday special is for the Church of England to have a message for the people. The Church of England should ask itself why its pews are full on Christmas eve and on Christmas day and why they are not full for the other 363 days of the year. If it could answer that question, there would be no need for legislation on Sunday trading. But it cannot. People want to shop on a Sunday and they should be free to do so.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: If today's debate on new clauses 14 and 10 demonstrates anything, it is the need for Government legislation on Sunday trading. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) has made a brave attempt, and I congratulate him on all the effort and hard work that has gone into it. But it has proved that to legislate on issues of conscience is beyond the resources of the Back Bencher and the resources allowed to back private Members' legislation.

The problem is that out of the good intentions of the legislation we have ended up with a mess; we have ended up with a dog's breakfast. We have ended up with Ogmore pie half baked as it has been presented to the House today. The Bill started with a simple, single, clear-cut objective. It has ended up with a mess. My hon. Friend is now attempting to pull the plug on that mess by means of new clause 14 which, I understand, he intends to vote against. That is an incomprehensible way to legislate on Sunday trading.

My hon. Friend started with a virtuous vestal virgin of a Bill and has ended up with not total but semi-promiscuity. The Bill cannot be totally promiscuous because of the long title of the Bill. At the end of the long evolution of the vestal virgin into a semi-harlot, my hon. Friend shoots her by tabling new clause 14. It does not make sense to proceed in that fashion. It shows the difficulties which face private Members in legislating on topics as controversial as shopping on Sundays.

If the Committee has done anything, it has given us a huge demonstration of the problem and has been a learning process. It has turned out highly trained neurotics, but it has gone a long way to explaining how difficult such legislation is.

We have heard all the arguments about Sunday trading. The debate on the new clause has been in some measure a Second Reading debate. Yesterday, I was reading Peter Paterson's book on Lord George-Brown entitled "Tired and Emotional", which is presumably how the members of the Standing Committee ended up. It gives the example of Lord George-Brown as Minister of Works in 1950-51 opening the Tower of London on Sundays.

All the stock arguments came out. People said that there was no demand to have the Tower of London open on Sundays. They said that the Beefeaters wanted to go to church and the sermons sometimes overran. They said that the Beefeaters must have a hot dinner on Sundays. They said that the Beefeaters must be able to take their children to the countryside or the seaside on Sundays. All the arguments against the Sunday opening of the Tower of London have been repeated today.

At the end of the debate, we must decide on new clause 14. It would be much preferable to make an immediate decision on new clause 10, which is a more realistic solution to the problems posed by the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore started out with a simple principle designed to stop shopping on Sundays—the basic principle of the Keep Sunday Special campaign. One would think that it was possible to legislate for a simple principle, but people then offer various exceptions to it. What about wet fish, for instance, about which more perceptive Members have argued? As soon as one enshrines a simple principle, everyone comes along with a list of exceptions.

The Bill started with a simple principle, but an increasing number of loopholes have been allowed in it. That list of exceptions is open to many mistakes, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore has already admitted, many gaps will have to be filled in the House of Lords. New clause 10, tabled by my hon. Friend, allows for that as part of the legislative process.

One can never get a perfect list of exemptions and those that we have ended up with seem to be male-oriented. As has already been remarked upon, there are many things for the boys, the lads, to do on Sunday. They can go to the DIY, get the motor spares and go down to the garage. There is not much for the girls, the women, to do, except to stay at home and cook the dinner for the lads to arrive back, drunk, loaded down with motor spares and DIY equipment to start cutting up their wives, the joint, or whatever on a Sunday.

The exemptions will be allowed under an extremely bureaucratic procedure. People must register and prove that 80 per cent. of the business is in the specified, exempt categories. Those registrations must be processed within a month, but there is no suggestion about who will pay for that. Newsagents, for example, who have traded on Sundays for years, will have to go through that formal procedure to prove that they are fit to be exempt. We have ended up with a Bill that no longer keeps Sunday special; it does not even keep it semi-special, because it will be left in a mess.

Mr. Dowd: Does my hon. Friend agree that KSS no longer means keeping Sunday special but keeping supermarkets shut?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) continues, may I remind the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) that he should address me and not the Bench behind him.

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is the weakness in the argument about protecting pay and conditions. Those terms will be protected by firing workers in supermarkets who want to work on a Sunday. The Bill will deprive them of that opportunity and it will, in the end, result in lost jobs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): In the mid-1980s, I was the junior Minister responsible for this issue, when 4 million people worked regularly on Sundays and 4 million others worked part-time or occasionally on a Sunday. Not a single one sent a single letter of complaint to his or her Member of Parliament which was then passed to me.

Mr. Mitchell: That bears out my experience of talking to shop workers—they want to work on Sunday. They do not feel that they will be discriminated against if they do not work on a Sunday, but the great majority of them want to work on that day to earn extra money. It also gives them the opportunity to arrange their working week to suit their family circumstances. The father could stay at home on Sunday, for example, to look after the kids while the wife was working.

Ms Janet Anderson: The big four supermarkets employ 57,000 shop workers every Sunday, the vast majority of whom are women. In 1992 alone, they earned, between them, £100 million.

Mr. Mitchell: I want to encourage that process, but I do not feel that the Bill does so. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

It is as if my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore realised the impossibility of succeeding with the Bill and decided, at the last minute, to throw in what he calls an opportunity to debate the three options, even though he will vote against all three. However, we are not debating the three options that the Government will advance. We are certainly not debating total deregulation. How could we when the Bill's long title states that it is to "Provide for a general prohibition on the opening on Sunday of shops for retail trade or business"?

1.15 pm

We are not even debating what is, for me and for most Opposition Members, the central issue: the pay and the regulation of labour conditions necessary for working on Sunday. Under the Bill, we cannot debate that subject because to do so we would have to reject new clause 14—under which we were supposed to debate the options—and go back to the Bill itself, which is incomprehensible. The procedure is unsatisfactory and we cannot even have a proper discussion. How can it be said that we can have a proper discussion in the House of Commons when we have an attendance such as we have today and when hon. Members knew only at the last minute that we were to debate the alternatives?

Therefore, I conclude that the procedure turns what was a mess into a farce, and the House of Commons should not be asked to decide on it. It is essential that we wait for the Government's measures. I am sorry that their proposals are so belated. The Government have been dilatory and could not make up their minds about what to do. However, the only way is to use the authority of Government, with the backing of the research available to them and their legislative powers, to discuss the three choices and come to a decision.

Ultimately, even this place and the Government have to maintain certain standards on legislation. The Bill falls well below the standards even of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 and the abolition of pit bull terriers Bill—the previous dogs' breakfasts that we have approved in the House. We cannot legislate on a principle that starts simple and ends up a mess, then attempt to salvage it by way of a new clause.

What are we to do? The only option is to support new clause 10, with which I agree, but which is irrelevant if the Bill is to flounder, and abstain on new clause 14. We would then await the Government's proposals and opt for the principle of regulated liberalisation, as my own union, the GMB, and the Shopping Hours Reform Council are urging us to do.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I have listened to the debate with great interest. I shall first refer to the Minister's response—if one can call it a response. The people of this country will be alarmed that the Government were unable to make an unequivocal statement to the effect that those who have to work on Sundays will be protected by safeguards if deregulation is introduced. The Minister was silent when pressure was placed on him by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) and he was asked for a clear statement. We must take note of his reluctance. Surely the Government should uphold the principle that those people who do not wish to work on Sunday due to their convictions are given adequate protection. Such protection has not been afforded them by the shops that have been breaking the law.

A lady who is a member of my congregation works in a large store in the centre of Belfast which gives 50 per cent. discounts to all its workers—but that discount has been withdrawn from those who do not work on Sunday. If that is not discrimination and intimidation I do not know what is.

The Minister must make it clear where the Government stand on this issue. He says that we will vote on three separate matters, but he has not told the House whether we will be allowed a proper vote. Which vote will be taken first? Will the other two issues then fall?

The Minister has also told us that we will be given explanations of the reasons for the various proposals. Will he allow those opposed to Sunday opening to explain their position? Will he ask people who believe in partial opening to submit an explanation of their position? He is certainly quite capable of writing out his own explanation. What standing will these various explanations be given?

I believe that the Government are conniving at getting rid of all Sunday regulation. They want another Christmas, with all the large shops open. They will say that everyone wants that. They are putting off the day, however, because that suits them—the Government want as much time as possible.

Mr. Alton: The Minister has still not made it clear to us—perhaps he will take the opportunity to intervene on the hon. Gentleman—whether the Government will introduce a Bill in the Queen's Speech in the autumn. He said only that they intend to introduce a Bill, but he did not specificically mention the Queen's Speech.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I thought that I heard the Minister say something about the Queen's Speech, but I shall allow him to intervene.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We shall introduce a Bill in the autumn. Most Bills introduced in the autumn are listed in the Queen's Speech. I do not write that speech, but I can say that the Government have decided that there will be such a Bill.

Mr. Skinner: Still a bit vague.

Rev. Ian Paisley: We will see how the Government proceed, but we are certainly not hearing any firm commitment from the Government about the rights of workers and how they will be protected. That is the foundation on which they should build.

If the Government deregulate Sunday, will they then consider the day the same as any other working day? Do they believe that people who work on Sunday should be paid the same rate as they would be on another day? We need to know the Government's attitude.

I do not know whether any hon. Member lives beside one of these supermarkets, but many of my constituents do. The supermarkets are often built in areas where people live in their rows of houses. We have had a great deal of representation from them about the troubles with traffic, trolleys and congestion. Now Sunday will go the same way; but people should be allowed a breather, one day when they can escape traffic congestion and not be bothered by trolleys and the hustle and bustle of people shopping.

I listened with amazement to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who said that the Bill's supporters want to close shops. They want nothing of the kind. They want to close them on a Sunday, that is all. Anyone listening to the hon. Gentleman would have thought that the Bill's sponsors are trying to close down shops for ever. Not so; if people want to shop in them, they can certainly go on doing so. The hon. Gentleman spoke as though he were pleading for ordinary working people, but ordinary working people, the elderly and those who are busy cannot go to the supermarkets. The local independent shops supply them.

I draw attention to the findings of a Royal Town Planning Institute working party. In its paper, it said:

"Those who are disadvantaged by reason of poverty, who do not have access to a car, and who therefore are dependent on existing local and neighbourhood shops cannot easily take advantage of the facilities of the distant superstore. There is widespread concern that these disadvantaged consumers will increasingly suffer from double deprivation caused by lack of access to the advantageous, convenient and efficient forms of retailing combined with dependence on deteriorating quality, prices and choice in neighbourhood shops."

Mr. John Marshall: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Rev. Ian Paisley: No, I will not give way because time is short and others may wish to take part.

Independent local shops are important to the very fabric of society and they form a focus for the community. They are not impersonal like the big stores. That is why it is important that we get our priorities right. I welcome the fact that today we can vote on the three main issues. Now is the time to do that. It has been put off for far too long. Let us have it today.

If people did not think it worth while turning up for the debate today, that is their fault. Hon. Members may have been discouraged from attending, but if those who want a free vote to sort our Sunday trading in a complete sweep do not have their followers here, that is their business. We have to vote today. That is the job that we are called to do. If we do not make ourselves acquainted with the business of the House, that is our business. We have to vote on the issue and show what the House of Commons wants. I am glad that, in the previous vote, hon. Members representing Ulster pointed the way.

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You were in the Chair when the votes were taken on a contentious issue that could clarify whether or not Parliament is in favour of the proposals of the Shopping Hours Reform Council, total deregulation or the proposals in my Bill. The wish of the House has been made clear beyond any shadow of doubt by the last vote of 124 for to 13 against. Even more votes were cast against total deregulation, as one would expect. In the debate, one of my hon. Friends said that we had failed to find anyone who totally agreed with total deregulation to append his or her signature to the amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said that he would table an amendment so that a vote could be taken. This is a democracy, we are meeting on a Friday and every one of the 651 Members of Parliament has been informed that the debate is to take place today. Therefore, bearing in mind the decisions taken this afternoon, will you, Madam Deputy Speaker, accept a motion from me that we should now proceed to take the Third Reading of my Bill? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Where is the democracy —hon. Members cannot even accept a decision when——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make a speech. I understood his point of order and my answer is an unequivocal no. Madam Speaker has made her selection of new clauses and amendments. It is my duty to ensure that they are debated within the necessary constraints of time.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I hope that this is a different point of order.

Mr. Bottomley: It certainly is. I have been a Member for some time and I think that I have heard the occupant of the Chair give guidance on occasion that Members' votes are expected to follow their speeches. We have had two debates—one on amendment (a) and one on new clause 14. I think that those who moved the amendment and the new clause may not have voted for them. I should be grateful for your guidance on the conventions of the House and whether they merely provide guidance or are supposed to be adhered to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The rule is not quite as the hon. Gentleman thinks. The rule refers to the voice, when giving tongue to aye or no—not an actual speech. Those are the two factors that must go together. For example, an hon. Member could give a speech in favour of a measure and then vote against it.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I appeal to you in your role as defender of the traditions of the House and of the rights of Back Benchers. Has not the sad saga of the passage of this Bill shown the extent to which the Executive rules the procedures of this House and to which the will of Back Benchers has become as nothing? We have become nothing but ciphers. The clear will of the House is that there should be progress on the lines of the Bill, but the Government and their friends have, by this manoeuvre, ensured that there will be more lawbreaking for at least another 12 months. Surely time should be allowed for the will of the House to prevail over the will of the Government, who are conniving at the continuation of lawbreaking.

Madam Deputyn Speaker: I am afraid that these are not matters over and for which the Chair has any control or responsibility.

Mr. Cormack: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would you be prepared to discuss with Madam Speaker the implications not just of these votes but of the time allocated to Bills which manifestly enjoy the support of an overwhelming majority of the House, as demonstrated in the decisive Second Reading vote? I put it to you that in cases such as this it should be possible to work out a procedure to provide time. After all, in percentage terms the Bill had as decisive a majority on Second Reading as any Bill of recent years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have no doubt that Madam Speaker, who assiduously follows the proceedings of the Chamber, will be aware of what has been said today; but I remind the hon. Gentleman that these are precisely matters for consideration by the Procedure Committee, which was set up to deal with difficulties and disputes of this kind.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Perhaps I might be permitted to provide a helpful solution to the dilemma. Given this overwhelming majority, it is more than likely that some people who have tabled amendments might decide not to move them. I should be grateful for your confirmation that that is possible. If they did not move them, we could move on to a formal Third Reading and the Bill could go to the Lords. If those who have tabled the amendments do not withdraw them, I fear that outsiders will come to the conclusion that those who are not willing to co-operate in this way are influenced by the big vested interests of the multinationals, which are lawbreakers themselves. I hate to see members of the law and order party in conspiracy with concerted lawbreakers such as B and Q and all the rest of them.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no dilemma for me here. We shall not find out whether people are willing not to move their amendments unless we proceed to do so.

Mr. Fabricant: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. As a new Member of the House, may I ask whether it is usual to be given only three days' notice that issues as important as these are to be debated?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If it were not in order, it would not have been permitted.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Over the years the Government have time after time—yesterday was a classic example of this—broadened Bills to encompass matters well outside their long titles, although technically they may have come within the titles. Is not it sad that no way can be found to enable the House to exercise its will at this stage? It seems that everything depends on Ministers and on the Government's business managers, operating through the usual channels. Surely, if this is a democracy —I sometimes think that, regrettably, it is an elective dictatorship—we can find a way to ensure that the will and the spirit of the House and the country bring to an end a scandal and a shame that has continued for many years. If we cannot do that, we might as well all pack our bags and go home.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is a lamentation with which I am familiar, but it is not my responsibility. Once again, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Stern: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I hope that, in discussing with Madam Speaker the issues arising out of the debate and proceedings on the Bill, you will draw her attention to two factors that have long-term implications for private Members' Bills. The first is the apparent ability of certain hon. Members to bully through support for a measure by reason of their position. The second is what happened today, when a long line of speakers spoke in support of a new clause against which they then voted.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have nothing to add to the points that I have already made.

Mr. Beith: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will you confirm that, in the terms of the procedure of the House, there is nothing to prevent the Leader of the House from making time available to deal with the 99 amendments and new clauses in the name of the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Dame A. Rumbold) and the other amendments? It might assist in the process that the Minister described earlier—of the Government having established that the will of the House is broadly in favour of one route, not deregulation or that described by the SHRC—if the Government would use their time to proceed in the matter. As the Leader of the House is not here, will you confirm that it is open to him to do that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is not for me to offer advice to the Leader of the House. However, I have no doubt that the right hon. Member can communicate directly with the Leader of the House.

Mr. John Marshall: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I thank you for standing up for the rights of Back Benchers who wish to debate the issues. It is wrong that the Chamber should be used as a constitutional steamroller, as the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) wanted. We have a right to debate the issues and he should not have interfered. Is not it an absurdity that we have been debating a new clause, proposed by the hon. Gentleman, against which he then voted?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have no further observation on that point. I have made it already.

Mr. Alfred Morris: On a point of order. Madam Deputy Speaker. In a recent statement from the Chair, Madam Speaker acceped for debate two hotly contested amendments to the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. In doing so, she said that they were incompatible and that if the House voted in favour of one of the amendments, there could be no vote on the other. Can you now rule, Madam Deputy Speaker, on how many of the remaining amendments on the amendment paper are incompatible with the decisions that have been taken by the House on the Bill today?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not offer views in advance of consideration of amendments.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have received several hundred cards from people writing in favour of restricting Sunday trading and several hundred from people opposed to Sunday trading. I have six cards sent to me by people both opposed and in favour. In view of the confusion throughout the country that that shows, I urge you to ask the Government to bring forward a Bill or a mechanism as soon as possible because many people obviously wish to have the matter resolved at a time when all hon. Members are here to decide on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wonder sometimes whether people actually hear what I say. I have said that the proper procedure is to go to the Procedure Committee, which is set up to deal with just such problems.

Mr. Alison: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. If I were now to propose, That the Bill be now read the Third time, it is clear in the light of what you said earlier that you would have to reply that you could not accept my proposal, because amendments on the order paper would have to be called. Given that the time factor now makes it impossible for any amendment to be called, I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must decline to propose the Question.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Lest those outside the House misunderstand your ruling, will you confirm that the matters that you say will be dealt with by the Procedure Committee will, in fact, be dealt with by a Committee dominated by Government supporters appointed by Whips who are in favour of rejecting the Bill? In what sense does the Procedure Committee provide a remedy for the problem that we encounter today?

It being half-past Two o'clock, further consideration of the Bill stood adjourned.

Remaining Private Member's Bills

RIGHT TO KNOW BILL

Order for consideration, as amended in the Standing Committee, read.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be considered on Friday 2 July.

CIVIL RIGHTS (DISABLED PERSONS) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day?

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Noting the objection of the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot), Friday 2 July, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 2 July.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Do you realise that the Bill to which an objection has been made was debated for some seven hours——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the House cannot debate the merits or otherwise of the Bill.

Mr. Powell: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am referring not to the merits of the Bill, but to the fact that a private Member's Bill intended to help disabled people was debated for seven hours, and cannot now be debated further on the Floor of the House because an objection has been made.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, our procedures do not allow us to discuss that point.

ENERGY (FAIR COMPETITION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 2 July.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [12 February].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 2 July.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. On the Second Reading of the Bill, the closure motion was carried by 78 votes to nil. This Bill has been killed off by two Tellers and the Government Whip. The House should take account of that in terms of its procedure.

PENSIONS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 2 July.

EUROPEAN UNION (PUBLIC INFORMATION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 2 July.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Resolved,

That,

(1) this House do meet on Thursday 27th May at half-past Nine o'clock;

(2) notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 17 (Time for taking questions), no Questions shall be taken, provided that at Eleven o'clock the Speaker may interrupt the proceedings in order to permit Questions to be asked which are in her opinion of an urgent character and relate either to matters of public importance or to the arrangement of business, statements to be made by Ministers, or personal explanations to be made by Members; and

(3) at Three o'clock the Speaker do adjourn the House without putting any Question, provided that this House shall not adjourn until the Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Deregulation and Privatisation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.35 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): It was interesting to note in the previous debate how the will of the House was manifested in favour of the Government not rushing into out-and-out deregulation. In that case, it was the highly important subject of Sunday trading. I was a supporter of the Shops (Amendment) Bill throughout its various stages. That particular process may now have lapsed, but I am sure that we shall return later to that agonising debate. It is one aspect of the importance of avoiding rushing into out-and-out deregulation that I wish to raise today.

I am grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for Technology for coming here to reply in this Adjournment debate. As he has just returned from an important visit overseas, I am even more grateful to him for being on the Treasury Bench today—although I know he will not mind my saying, given the importance of the subject, that at least the Minister for Industry, if not the President of the Board of Trade, should have been on duty to respond to the debate.

Although it is an Adjournment debate, there is, as you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, a respectable tradition in the House that matters of overriding political importance —not just local or marginal matters reflecting the particular interests of the Member concerned—can be raised on the Adjournment. I wish to air a big national subject, and that is a convenient way of doing it.

I did not select a Friday for this debate, although I am grateful to the Chair for having done so. If the debate had taken place in the Monday to Thursday period, more attention might have been paid to it. I hope that the press will give publicity to the subject, for it will become part of a significant debate in the months to come. Lest my hon. Friend the Minister thinks that I am growing excessively radical in, perhaps, the wrong sense, bearing in mind the last few years of political developments under a Conservative Government, I wish to reassure him that that is far from the case. All that I am doing is espousing the idea of a return to the commonsense, middle ground of British politics, which is particularly necessary in this matter.

The subject for debate on the Adjournment of the House are deregulation and privatisation but, if I may, I shall take them in reverse order. I have to declare a direct interest as the founder shareholder of a company in the City that has been involved in virtually all the successful privatisations that have been carried out by the Government since 1979, beginning with the first tranche of the British Telecom shares issue, followed by the privatisation of British Gas and other nationalised industries. It is true to say that, both pragmatically and objectively, it has been a successful programme, the effects of which, in most cases, have been beneficial to the economy. Most people, even Opposition Members, would agree, with that conclusion.

The programme has not been successful in all respects. In practical terms, the effects have not always been quite what was expected. For instance, in real terms, electricity is now more expensive as a consequence of privatisation than it was before, so privatisation has not always worked exactly in the way that we hoped. None the less, the overwhelming conclusion must be that it has been a success. Bearing that in mind, the irony of my suggestion is that we should have second thoughts now. This country has privatised more industries than any other country in the occidental world and elsewhere. The argument now, I believe, is that we should have serious second thoughts about further privatisation.

I pay tribute to our deceased colleague, the hon. Member for Christchurch, for his work on the railways, which are a good example of where the Government should have second thoughts and pause to ensure that we get the structures and the legislation right. I share the anxieties and fears of many people, including many loyal Conservatives, that we shall get it wrong for the sake of the inevitable, inexorable pressure of previous ideology, at a time when the era of Thatcherism has been fading away and should continue to fade away rapidly. I hope that we are returning to mainstream central conservatism for a long time ahead.

Robert Adley, whom we in the House lament, had a number of important points to make on the subject, not least in the report of the Select Committee on Transport. The Railways Bill has been amended in Committee with few second thoughts, which is a pity. I hope that there will be an opportunity for the Department of Transport and other parts of government to think carefully before rushing into an ill-considered, complicated structure for the sake of old ideological pressures that will not be in accordance with modern practical realities. A limited number of franchises, but only a few, may eventually be awarded to outside applicants, but I should like to see the essential component maintained so that British Rail is involved as an original applicant in its own right, subject to the final structure of the track authority and franchisers.

We are apparently approaching the final sell-off in British Telecom shares. Is it right for the Government, for old-fashioned, out-of-date ideological reasons, automatically to say that they must sell off the remaining shares? Why not keep 10 to 15 per cent. in public hands, bearing in mind the strategic and security aspects of telecommunications, which is a legitimate argument? Why should not the Government maintain and conserve a successful commercial investment that has done very well and would provide an interesting commercial sector dividend for the Treasury?

The main reason I urge second thoughts on privitisation and deregulation is the apparently upcoming privatisation of the Post Office. Even right-wing colleagues in the House and in the parliamentary Conservative party are having serious second thoughts about the arguments for Post Office privatisation. Again, I use the word deliberately in the conventional sense of privatisation in structural terms, but other parameters may be considered in the future. I hope so. I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry and the President of the Board of Trade will be open minded on the issue. I am encouraged by the delays that appear to be occuring. My hon. Friend the Minister has had hearings with people outside, with colleagues in the House and, I am sure, with Opposition Members. I remember that years ago we both rebelled against the abolition of the Greater London Council, so I am sure that he is not the kind of person to be an unthinking supporter of the Centre for Policy Studies and its old arguments and ideological nostrums, which have now been bypassed by the passage of time and by the return to pragmatic Conservative common sense.

The public want this Conservative Government, whom they re-elected last year—I was as delighted about that as my hon. Friend the Minister—to concentrate on the revival and recovery of the British economy, the revival and reconstruction of our essential social services and a return to common sense in education policy. They do not want us to go on at excessive length about old pre-occupations with old-fashioned ideology on privatisation, particularly when it clearly is not necessary for the Post Office.

Future structures may be needed because Post Office management, supported by employees and, I am sure, unions, would like the Post Office to be free to go into the marketplace for future investment and capital requirements, which it cannot do at the moment because of the shackles of Treasury control and the need for a minimum return.

All sorts of options can be considered and I certainly advocate the idea of a public corporation with the Government still involved through, perhaps, a minority shareholding—such as with British Telecom, if the Government do not sell their remaining shares. An employee-management buy-out might be the right way forward. That would offer the freedom that we saw in the successful privatisation of the National Freight Corporation, which represented popular capitalism at its best, with amazingly successful results. Van drivers with the NFC now have £150,000 of capital or more, and as a result they are as addicted as my hon. Friend and I to the modern welfare capitalist system.

That may be the approach. However, the old-fashioned idea of a sell-off for its own sake, simply because the Treasury still needs money to reduce the deficit, is depressingly familiar. It is otiose and out of date for a unique body that is part of the public sector in a real sense and also has links with the Crown which have to be borne in mind in the future.

My final comments—I want to give my hon. Friend a chance to reply—will be about deregulation. We now use that term in two senses, which causes a certain amount of confusion. Although I am in favour of it, I am not thinking primarily today of deregulation in the sense of a bonfire of controls. In fact, despite the fact that I am a supporter of the bonfire of controls and of getting rid of excessive red tape and bureaucracy, as anyone with common sense would be—I suppose that it would be a wider part of the citizens charter—I find it slightly amusing that the Government are now relaunching that as a policy although we have been in power since 1979. I thought that we were supposed to have done it before. I am thinking more of deregulation in areas such as the Sunday trading legislation that the House debated earlier, in which the Government could still be tempted to say that they remained, empirically, out-and-out deregulators, if that is not a contradiction in terms—I sometimes think that it is. That would be a great pity.

I shall raise two points to which it may be difficult for my hon. Friend to respond, as they are not in the province and ambit of his Department—but no doubt we can both consult our colleagues in other parts of the Government later. As a London Member, I wish to refer specifically to deregulation plans for London buses and black taxi cabs. I apologise for the fact that, because my hon. Friend was abroad, I could not give him notice that I intended to raise that subject, too.

[Mr. Hugh Dykes]

In terms of deregulation as a general principle, the time has come when we can return to pragmatic, sensible, middle-of-the-road Macmillan-type Conservatism. I hope that, as we have been assured discreetly and privately by our colleagues, that is a genuine return by the Government to common sense and to the centre ground. I therefore hope that deregulation will no longer be a central plank of our policy in general terms. I feel strongly that deregulation of the buses in London would be a disaster. All the evidence points to such a policy being quite wrong. The present limited contract franchise system is adequate and successful for London.

We do not, of course, contemplate deregulating the tube, which would be rather a difficult matter to engineer, I presume, as there is no intrinsic competition that one could create alongside tube trains. We have seen how regulation and a certain restricted framework for London's black cabs have produced the best result. There is competition between individual cabs and cab companies, yet the restrictive regulatory framework for qualification and control provides us with the blessing of the best taxi service of any capital city in the world that I can think of.

If the Government abandon a return to common sense and pragmatism and say, "No, no, we must continue. The Centre for Policy Studies is still alive and kicking, and we owe it to all the acolytes who did their research years ago to fulfil their views and wishes in future legislation" our own supporters as well as the general public will be profoundly disappointed. The Government now have a wonderful opportunity to say that second thoughts are legitimate in politics, and that this is a good example. I hope that my hon. Friend will reassure me and the House that that is the case.

2.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Technology (Mr. Edward Leigh): As always, the House will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) for putting his views forward in such a forthright manner. The Conservative party is, of course, a broad church and if a broad church is to work it is important that we have various different strands of thinking. My hon. Friend has always been assiduous and consistent in advancing his ideas and he has done so again today. I am grateful to him, as the whole Government will be.

My hon. Friend mentioned the Centre for Policy Studies two or three times, but the Centre for Policy Studies does not run the Government. It is a think tank and we listen to its views as much as we listen to the views of our Back Benchers. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that all those various views are condensed into effective policy making. Of course, the Government have noted what he has said today about privatisation of British Rail, about deregulation in general and about London taxis. I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if, despite the fact that he raised wider transport matters today, I do not venture into that territory. He will know that as a Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, I am not responsible for transport matters. In view of the seriousness with which my hon. Friend has conducted the debate today, I hope that he will be satisfied if I inform my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport of his views. I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend will be able to give him a reply.

I apologise for the fact that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is not able to be here today. I hope that my hon. Friend will be satisfied with my humble presence. I shall do my best in the little time available to me to answer some of his points. As he said, his subject is wide. Normally on these occasions, it is simple for those briefing the Minister to divine what will be the subject of the debate. This is such a broad debate that I hope that my hon. Friend will not be too disappointed if I do not launch into a full-scale defence of changes in Sunday trading laws, or of the privatisation of this or that industry. I shall do my best to take up some of his points.

To return to the theme with which I opened, what unites us in the Conservative party is much greater than what divides us. All in the Conservative party are united on the great importance of our deregulation initiative which my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has made an absolute priority for himself. My hon. Friend alluded to that, so I hope that he will forgive me if I spend a few moments towards the end of my speech telling the House about our progress on the deregulation initiative. It is an important matter which falls within the general title of the debate.

The Government's privatisation programme, as my hon. Friend mentioned, goes back almost 14 years and stems from the strong belief that enterprise flourishes best and provides better services to customers if management is free to manage without interference from the Government in commercial matters. Privatisation is a natural partner to deregulation. Our privatisation programme has released 46 major companies and many more smaller businesses from the straitjacket of state control. Bureaucratic and political interference in commercial decisions have been cast off. Since privatisation, the companies have had the freedom to grow and to develop within the discipline of a competitive market.

The benefits of privatisation have been clearly demonstrated by improvement in the performance of individual companies, whether in productivity, profitability or better-quality products. My hon. Friend mentioned electricity prices. Domestic prices have risen slightly in real terms by 2·5 per cent. in total, but the director general is reviewing the supply price control which is due to be revised on 1 April. As Minister with responsibility for telecommunications, I am far more familiar with BT. There has been a dramatic fall in prices in telecommunications across the board. There is no doubt that privatisation has generally resulted in a much better service being available to the consumer and in a fall in prices. Above all, it has resulted in much greater investment, especially in the water companies and in telecommunications.

New regulatory regimes have been created for the utilities. New markets in utility services have been created and the monopoly element of the businesses needs special attention in the interests of customers and to provide incentives to increased efficiency. The regulators have an important role in promoting competition in the new markets and providing opportunities for new entrants to introduce new ideas and services to the benefit of customers. It has been recognised that regulation is in itself a barrier to entry in the markets. Our objective has been to promote the minimum regulation necessary to provide proper protection for customers while enhancing the prospects of competitive development of the markets.

My hon. Friend referred to the Post Office. As he is aware, I am the Minister with responsibility for the Post Office, so I shall deal briefly with that subject. As my hon. Friend agrees, the Post Office is now doing an excellent job. The quality of the first-class service has risen from 74·5 per cent. next-day delivery in 1988-89 to 91·7 per cent. between April 1992 and January 1993. This is the 18th year of subsidy-free profit. Profitability has increased from about £86 million in 1989-90 to £247 million in 1991-92. We have the most comprehensive network of post office counters in Europe and the average queuing time is now just two minutes.

However, the Post Office is facing a period of considerable change and great challenge in the marketplace. Postal services are facing increasing competition from the telecommunications sector. Direct mail marketing, an important part of Royal Mail's volumes, is facing competition from magazine and television advertising. The Post Office must be free to respond to such changes and challenges. It was the realisation of these new opportunities and the need for the Post Office to be able to meet the challenges which prompted the Government to conduct a review of the future organisation and structure of the Post Office.

As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the review of Royal Mail and Post Office Counters last July. Let me make it clear to my hon. Friend—as he specifically raised the point today—that that should not necessarily be taken as implying that the Post Office will be privatised. It is no secret that we are looking at options to privatise Royal Mail and Post Office Counters, but we are looking at continued public sector ownership as well as private sector options. No final decisions have been taken and what my hon. Friend has said today will clearly be of great interest to us.

Although the question of the ownership of the Post Office is important, another issue that we are having to consider is the competitive environment in which the future Post Office will operate, whether it is in the private or the public sector. We accept that a degree of monopoly protection for letters is necessary to permit the continuation of a universal service with delivery to every address in the country within a uniform and affordable tariff. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that, as far as the public is concerned, that is the most important issue that we have to address. Whatever may be our views on the question of ownership, that is what the public cares about and what we must ensure. I assure my hon. Friend that the Government are wholly committed to those objectives. They are not negotiable and we believe that restrictions are necessary if they are to be achieved.

Although I am always keen to examine the potential scope for deregulation—and we are, indeed, committed to permitting more competition—I do not think that, in the case of mail services, full deregulation is appropriate. I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend. We looked at the matter carefully. The tenor of much of my hon. Friend's speech was that he thinks that, in certain cases, we have tried to deregulate too much. Clearly, in conducting the review, we examined the Post Office carefully. One conclusion that we reached was that full deregulation of the Post Office is impossible. The outcome for rural postal users of a free-for-all would be higher prices and poorer quality of service. I appreciate that my hon. Friend represents an urban constituency, but I suspect that if there were full deregulation of postal services, there could even be some diminution of service in suburban areas such as the area of north London that he represents.

We cannot allow the future provision of our social commitments to be an act of faith or to be provided in a haphazard fashion—but nor will we allow necessary restrictions on competition to become an abuse of monopoly power. That is why we made a commitment in the citizens charter to the creation of a postal regulator to oversee and enforce the provision of a universal service. Even here, however, we are keen to avoid over-regulation. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall not be unleashing a regulator on the multitude of private parcel carriers and delivery services. The role of the regulator will be to police the universal service and to ensure that the Post Office competes fairly where the market can sustain competition.

My hon. Friend made a point of referring to the Post Office. As the Minister responsible, I am glad that he did so. I hope that my few remarks have reassured him that we are not rushing in where angels fear to tread and that we have conducted the most careful review possible of all the options. As my hon. Friend said, we have consulted widely, and I am grateful for what he said in his usual shrewd and assiduous way.

A factor that nationalised industries, privatised industries and private sector companies have in common is that they must all operate more or less under the general regulatory regime existing today. It is a tribute to them all that they have managed so well despite the regulatory burden that has been allowed to accumulate under successive Governments. There is evidence that the rate of accumulation of regulations has been accelerating in the United Kingdom, as it has in many other advanced economies. The consequent burden stifles enterprise and distracts business from its proper task of supplying competitive goods and services.

It is important that we unite both inside the Government and outside to concentrate on the deregulation initiative, and we will do so in a considered manner. We have already drawn up a domesday book of regulations. It has been placed in the Library and my hon. Friend can consult it. The initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will prove to be one of the most important and most successful aspects of this Government. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East for initiating this debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

Transpennine Strategy

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if a decision has yet been taken in respect of the link between the M65 and the A1(T) through Skipton by dual two-lane carriageway; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if his Department has received the transpennine strategy report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The transpennine study strategy report was published in September 1992. The consultation period on this document is now drawing to a close. No decisions on the options in the report will be taken until all responses to the consultation have been considered.

Rail Services

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the importance of local rail services in the north-west region to disabled people.

Mr. Freeman: I am fully aware of the importance of rail services generally to disabled people. That is why under our privatisation plans the regulator will have a duty to have regard to the interests of people with disabilities in performing his functions.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Bernard Shaw Estate

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) what have been the proceeds from the Bernard Shaw estate administered by the Public Trustee since 1963;

(2) what he estimates have been the proceeds of the Bernard Shaw estate accruing to the British museum in each year since 1990.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Public Trustee does not normally disclose publicly information about the estates of private individuals. In particular, the Public Trustee is obliged by rule 29(2) of the Public Trustee Rules 1912 to observe strict secrecy in respect of every trust or estate in course of administration by him.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Serious Fraud Office

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Attorney-General how many assistant directors are seconded from accountancy firms to the Serious Fraud Office; what civil service pay grade they are paid at; what pay they continue to receive from their accountancy firms; and what arrangements are in force to prevent conflicts of interest in inquiries into any business handled by the firms from which they are seconded.

The Attorney-General: Three assistant directors are seconded from accountancy firms to the Serious Fraud Office. Their firms are reimbursed at civil service grade 5 level—with an addition in respect of pension entitlement—and the pay they receive is a matter between themselves and their firms. The arrangements in force to prevent conflicts of interest are:

i. The secondees are subject to civil service provisions including the attendant duty of confidentiality.

ii On acceptance of a case, following the vetting procedure, the auditors and financial advisers to companies involved in the investigation will have been identified. The deputy director, who allocates the assistant directors and accountancy teams, will be aware of these and ensure that there is no conflict.

iii. Prior to a secondment, parent firms confirm that secondees will advise the SFO of any potential conflict of interest. Secondees have access to their firm's client lists to enable them to do so. They are also governed by professional rules relating to conflicts of interest. Such obligations continue after the period of secondment has expired.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Attorney-General if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) of 26 April, Official Report, column 262, he will set out the number of documents, and the number of pages they comprise in total, that have been sent to the Scott inquiry by his Department.

The Attorney-General: The legal secretariat to the Law Officers has submitted 240 documents, comprising 1,552 pages, to Lord Justice Scott's inquiry.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Car Boot Sales

Mr. Purchase: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the revenue lost to bona fide shopkeepers by the activities of regular and frequent organised commercial car boot sales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has made no such estimate.

Post Office Pension Scheme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what role his advisers on the Post Office review have had in offering advice on pension funds or schemes.

Mr. Leigh: The work undertaken by the Department's advisers has covered all matters relevant to the structure and ownership of the Post Office, and the prospects for greater competition in the postal market.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the present size of the surplus in the Post Office superannuation scheme.

Mr. Leigh: As recorded in the 1991-92 Post Office report and accounts, at the date of the last full actuarial valuation of the Post Office staff superannuation scheme—31 March 1991—the market value of its assets was £7·887 billion. This was considered sufficient to cover 122·4 per cent. of the benefits which had accrued to members of POSSS and represented a surplus of approximately £1·4 billion at the time of the valuation. The last full valuation of the Post Office pension scheme was at 31 March 1989. At that date, the market value of the assets of the scheme was £47 million; this was sufficient to cover 130·8 per cent. of the benefits accrued to members and represented a surplus of approximately £11 million at the time of the valuation.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the recent practice, and what are the present intentions, of the Post Office with regard to holidays on employer contributions to the pension fund.

Mr. Leigh: The Post Office has been taking a holiday on its employer contributions to the Post Office staff superannuation scheme since April 1990. The most recent full valuation of this scheme was 31 March 1991. The Post Office has no contributions holiday in respect of the Post Office pension scheme; the last full valuation of this scheme was at 31 March 1989 and a further valuation of the scheme at 31 March 1992 is currently under way. The Post Office's contributions to its pension schemes are made in full accordance with the schemes' trust deeds and actuarial advice.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what restrictions exist on the transfer of pension fund surpluses from the Post Office superannuation scheme in the event of the privatisation of Parcelforce.

Mr. Leigh: The rules governing all aspects of transfers out of the Post Office staff superannuation scheme and the Post Office pension scheme are contained in each scheme's trust deeds.

Biotechnological Inventions

Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration he has given to the status of animals in relation to the proposed EC directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions.

Mr. Leigh: A revised version of the European Commission's draft directive was published in December 1992 and provides that inventions concerning living matter, including animals, shall in general be patentable. However, a number of exclusions are proposed, one of which concerns processes for genetically modifying animals. I am considering the revised draft together with the comments on it made by interested circles and expect it to be debated by an appropriate committee of the House in the near future.

In the United Kingdom, the use of animals in scientific procedures is controlled by the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, which complies with the relevant EC directive 86/609/EEC. It seems reasonable that inventions resulting from research carried out in conformity with the Act and directive should have the benefit of patents.

Konver Programme

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with local authorities about the implementation of the EC Konver programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Officials of my Department are in regular contact with local authorities on the Konver initiative.

Laboratories

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the future of the National Physical Laboratory, the National Engineering Laboratory, the Warren Spring Laboratory, the Laboratory of the Government Chemist and the National Weights and Measures Laboratory.

Mr. Heseltine: During the three years since becoming executive agencies, the DTI's five laboratories have made much progress towards becoming more commercial and customer-focused and more cost-conscious organisations. I am now undertaking a review, involving independent consultants, which will identify how best to build on this progress. It will complement the review of the Atomic Energy Authority which my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy announced on 1 April.

The four larger laboratories—though not the NWML—are already required to operate on a business footing, financing themselves from contracts secured at arm's length from fee-paying customers. Most of their business comes, and will continue to come, from Government Departments, including the DTI itself, the Department of the Environment, the Department of Transport, and others. They also win contracts from private sector customers.

These disciplines are bringing about a major change in the culture of these organisations, and the question on which consultants will be asked to advise is how this process can be carried further, and whether putting some or all of them into the private sector would enable them to provide a better service to their wide range of customers, in and out of Government. The consultants will also be asked to consider intermediate options, short of full privatisation, such as the franchising of facilities to private sector contractors, and the possible need for rationalisation between the five laboratories.

A number of consultancy firms have now been invited to submit proposals. The chosen firm or firms should be appointed early this month, and report later this year. I will report to the House on my conclusions.

Electricity (Large Users)

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he plans to embark on further consultations on the proposals to allow large users to bypass the electricity pool outlined in the recent White Paper, "Prospects for Coal".

Mr. Eggar: My officials are now writing to holders of electricity licences, the Director General of Electricity Supply, representatives of consumers, the electricity pool and others to seek their views on the circumstances in which consumers might contract directly with generators outside the electricity pool.

At present, the majority of customers who use electricity generated on site do not use the integrated electricity system and therefore do not pay pool charges. Additionally, if no supply licence is involved no fossil fuel levy is paid.

The Government are considering whether it would be appropriate to extend these arrangements to consumers who pair themselves with generating sets which are not located on site. These consumers would pay charges according to the benefits or services they take from the integrated system.

The Government are also considering possible relaxation of the current supply exemption class where electricity is generated and consumed on site.

I am placing copies of the consultation documents in the Library of the House.

Package Holidays

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action his Department has taken to publicise to tour organisers their responsibilities under the EC directive on package holidays to ensure quality services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 April 1993]: My Department has published guidance notes to the package travel regulations which are available free of charge. My Department has also supported the work which has been done by the Association of British Travel Agents, the Institute of Trading Standards Administration, the British Tourist Authority and others to publicise and explain the regulations.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what monitoring his Department conducts to ensure that tour operators provide adequate quality of services on overseas holidays in accordance with the EC directive on package travel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 27 April 1993]: The provisions of the package travel regulations which carry criminal penalties are enforced by local authority trading standards departments.

National Technology Acquisition Plan

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how he proposes to respond, and to inform Parliament of his response, to the national strategic technology acquisition plan submitted to him by his Department's aviation committee.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 27 April 1993]: The national strategic technology acquisition plan for aeronautics contains commercially sensitive information and will not therefore be published. Officials have discussed the NSTAP with the aviation committee; these discussions will continue.

Development Aid

Sir Rhodes Boyson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish the total amount of regional grants, support for industry and any other assistance given by his Department in (a) England, (b) Greater London and (c) the south east, excluding Greater London, for each year from 1982-83 to 1992-93, estimated, distinguishing between current and capital expenditure, though excluding local authority credit approvals and capital allocations.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 28 April 1993]: Regional assistance was not available in London or elsewhere in the south-east in the years 1982-83 to 1992-93. Information on support for industry and other assistance in London and the south-east is not available except at disproportionate cost. Details of the total level of DTI expenditure on regional assistance, support for industry and other assistance are published following each financial year and are available from the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sudan

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the United Nations organisation to increase its involvement in the peace process in Sudan and to encourage an investigation into human rights abuses.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We were a prime mover in securing the appointment by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva of a special rapporteur to investigate the human rights situation on a public basis throughout Sudan. We are in touch with our EC partners, the United States and others about further ways in which we might involve the United Nations on Sudan.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to make available resources to assist non-governmental organisations to attend the forthcoming first preparatory committee meeting for the fifth review conference of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty to be held in New York in May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received no requests from non-governmental organisations for assistance in attending this meeting.

Arms Sales

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he received a copy of the proposal from the 89th Interparliamentary Union assembly in New Delhi relating to a ban on arms sales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs received on 27 April a copy of a resolution entitled "Transparency in Arms Transfers through a global Arms Register, notably as a means to check the growing use of violence to achieve political objectives". This resolution did not propose a ban on arms sales.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on 21 April, Official Report, column 108, what were the voting figures for each member state recorded in the meeting of the European Community's Foreign Affairs Council held on 5 April.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 20 April, Official Report, column 60.

Year of the Family

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives are being planned by his Department in connection with the United Nations Year of the Family 1994.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The International Year of the Family has our full support. We see our contribution as best channelled through those voluntary organisations which we already support, including the non-governmental co-ordinating body for the year, the United Kingdom Association for the IFY 94. In conjunction with our EC partners we are also working on plans for a European conference on the future of the family.

Gibraltar

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect of the application to the people of Gibraltar of the principle of self-determination and of the provisions of the treaty of Utrecht; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) on 6 December 1990, Official Report, column 189.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs under what circumstances the Government would recognise the acquisition of land by force by the Bosnian Serbs.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The London conference made it clear in its statement of principles that we would not recognise advantages gained by force or fait accompli in the former Yugoslavia. We remain convinced that only a negotiated settlement by all parties will produce genuine and lasting peace.

EDUCATION

University Funding

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when the Higher Education Funding Council intends to publish the average units of council funding which formed the basis of the university funding allocations for 1993-94.

Mr. Boswell: The Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) is aiming to publish this information shortly.

Technology Schools Initiative

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he intends to take to promote the technology schools initiative in future years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: Two hundred and twenty-two maintained secondary schools have been awarded capital allocations as a result of competitive bids in the 1992-93 and 1993-94 rounds of the technology schools initiative. The Department is taking steps to promote an active network of TSI schools, with a view to enabling them to share their experience in the teaching of technology and to feeding the benefits of the initiative into other secondary schools. The Government intend to maintain their support for TSI schools. Decisions on whether to invite further bids for 1994-95 or later years have yet to be taken.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Agencies

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the names, the salaries of the chief executives and the total wage bill for each next steps agency created since 1979;

(2) what is the total wages bill for next steps agencies in the period 1992-93.

Mr. Portillo: The names of agencies and their chief executives are published in the "Next Steps Briefing Note, 1 April 1993", available from the Cabinet Office. Information about agency wage bills and the salaries of chief executives for 1991-92 is available from the published accounts of the agencies concerned; copies are available in the House of Commons Library. For 1991-92 the total full-year wage bill of agencies in operation for all or part of that year is estimated at about £3·2 billion. The information requested is not yet available for 1992-93.

Market Testing

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what provision has been made for allocations of additional funding to Departments for redundancy costs under the market testing programme.

Mr. Portillo: There is no central provision specifically for redundancy costs. Within the limits set for spending on running costs, including redundancy costs, it is for Departments to decide how to allocate their administrative budget to meet their departmental priorities and objectives. Should they be unable to absorb the costs, the Treasury is prepared to look sympathetically at the scope for easing the burden of up-front redundancy costs within the limits of what can be afforded.

Duty-free Alcohol

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average excise and VAT saving for an individual who buys in France his or her full indicative level of the following: 10 litres of mid-priced spirits, 20 litres of mid-priced fortified wine, 30 litres of mid-priced table wine and 60 litres of mid-priced sparkling wine.

Sir John Cope: Based on current exchange rates, an individual could save around £200 on excise duty. A further £34 would be saved from the consequential VAT applied to the excise duty. These figures are independent of the price of the goods.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions have been carried out against British companies importing goods from the former Yugoslavia since 31 May 1992.

Sir John Cope: There have been no prosecutions.

T. and G. Woodware, Bristol

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action Her Majesty's Government intend to take against the British company T. and G. Woodware of Bristol.

Sir John Cope: Customs tells me that it has no reason to take any action.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 22 March regarding a constituent.

Mr. Dorrell: I wrote to the hon. Member on 4 May.

European Bank for Reconstruction and Development

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will request the governors of the European bank for reconstruction and development to make a statement on the bank's expenditure on administrative overheads; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will take action to ensure that the European bank for reconstruction and development reduces its expenditure on administrative overheads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 20 April 1993]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made clear in his statement to the European bank for reconstruction and development's annual meeting, on 27 April, the European bank for reconstruction and development's duty to use the taxpayer's resources as cost effectively as possible. The Government have always sought to secure the best possible value for money from all the international financial institutions.

Her Majesty's Government welcome the measures agreed by the bank's board of directors and recently announced by President Attali to strengthen budgetary procedures at the European bank for reconstruction and development.

Many governors made statements at the European bank for reconstruction and development's annual meeting on 26 and 27 April on the need for the European bank for reconstruction and development to make the most cost-effective use of the resources entrusted to it.

NHS Borrowing

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, Official Report, column 180, if he will make a statement on the impact on the public sector borrowing requirement of (a) the decision to relax the rules governing national health service borrowing, (b) leasing arrangements and (c) the use of private sector services by the national health service.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The rules governing the measurement of the PSBR are unchanged. When the national health service leases from the private sector, the annual lease payments are a determinant of the PSBR. Payments by the public sector, including the national health service, to the private sector for services provided also continue to be a determinant of the PSBR. Any borrowing undertaken by the private sector to finance its own spending would not count against the PSBR.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will reduce the qualifying period for attendance allowance to three months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to do so.

Benefits (Payment Delays)

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security under what circumstances compensation will be paid in recognition of delays in payments of benefits.

Mr. Lilley: Redress for the citizen when things go wrong is at the heart of the citizens charter. I am therefore pleased to announce a significant improvement to my Department's arrangements for compensation payments when benefit claims have been excessively delayed. The new arrangements will take effect for all new claims paid from 1 April 1993.

Until now, compensation was only considered when the delay in payment of benefit in new claims was at least 12 months. I am now proposing to reduce this period. In future, compensation will be considered where a new claim is delayed for six months beyond the target set for clearing the bulk of claims—usually between 85 per cent. and 95 per cent. This will meet points which I know have been of increasing concern to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration in cases which he has been investigating.

The effect will be to bring forward the date from which compensation may be paid and to link this date explicitly with the performance targets set for the Benefits Agency. In the case of income support, for example, where the relevant target in the BA business plan is to clear 90 per cent. of claims in 13 working days, compensation would be considered after around seven months from the date of entitlement, compared with 12 months today. No change will be made in respect of war pensions or industrial disability benefits, where the effect of the new formula would be to extend the current 12-month period.

The other criteria against which compensation is considered will remain the same: namely that the delay must be caused by official error and the arrears of benefit due must be £50 or more.

I recognise, however, that the improvement I am announcing today will be too late for those people who claimed disability living allowance last year and suffered unacceptable delays before receiving payment of the benefit. In view of the exceptional problems following the introduction of DLA a special compensatory payment will be made to those people who:

(i) made a new claim for DLA, attendance allowance or mobility allowance on or after 3 February 1992;
(ii) were paid benefit before 1 April 1993; and
(iii) suffered a delay in the payment of benefit of more than eight months.

The payment to this particular group of people will be at the rate of £10 per month for each month in excess of the eight-month period. The Benefits Agency is making the necessary arrangements to ensure that the payments are made as soon as possible. The agency will assess the amounts of compensation without the need for claims for compensation from customers. The task should be completed in the autumn.

Well Person Clinics

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost to the Exchequer to date of payment by the Benefits Agency for all staff aged 35 years and over to attend private well person clinics; and how many such staff have to date attended.

Mr. Burt: The Benefits Agency has corporate responsibility for the management and funding of the health screening programme for staff aged 35 years or over.

For reasons of commercial confidentiality, the number of staff examined cannot be given. Up to 31 March 1993, the total cost to the Exchequer was £2·1 million.

PRIME MINISTER

Buses

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will commission a study of experience of bus tendering in London, deregulation elsewhere in England and Great Britain and of regulation in Northern Ireland.

The Prime Minister: The Transport Select Committee is currently considering these issues in the context of its inquiry into bus deregulation in London and is taking evidence from a number of sources, including the Government.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Prime Minister what is his policy for taking senior British business representatives with him on official overseas visits.

The Prime Minister: I am firmly committed to taking senior business representatives with me whenever possible when I visit key markets overseas. My recent visits with a business group to India and Saudi Arabia were examples. I intend to build on them. I hope to visit Japan in the Autumn with senior business representatives.

My ministerial colleagues also take every opportunity to promote Britain and British goods abroad. They are planning to lead at least 14 missions to 17 countries, to markets as diverse as Ghana, Singapore and Kazakstan this year.

Prerogative Powers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the groups of actions taken using prerogative powers for which it would incur disproportionately high costs for them to be recorded individually.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to record the occasions on which prerogative powers are used where disproportionate costs would not be involved.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister what prerogative powers have been attenuated by being bought within statute law since 1979.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 1 March at column 19, and to the response of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Home Department's response to the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Garrett) on 21 April at column 492. The relationship between statutory and prerogative powers can be very complex. This complexity would mean examination of each section of each Act passed since 1979 in order to determine whether a prerogative power had been brought within statute law. This would be impracticable and would lead to disproportionate cost.

Treaty on European Union

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Prime Minister what consideration was given at the European Council held at Edinburgh in December 1992 to the termination of membership of any member state of the European Community in the event of non-ratification of the treaty on European union.

The Prime Minister: The issue was not considered at the Edinburgh European Council.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 4 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 4 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Kent Marshes

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what studies have been carried out into water availability in the north Kent marshes for site of special scientific interest management and environmentally sensitive area implementation;

(2) what criteria he will employ to decide the priority for water level management on SSSI in north Kent and the creation of new wetland areas under the recently announced environmentally sensitive area.

Mr. Curry: During the preparation of the north Kent marshes environmentally sensitive area (ESA) extensive consultations were carried out on all aspects of the scheme, including the availability and management of water. English Nature was one of the organisations consulted both in respect of the ESA as a whole and the sites of special scientific interest (SSSI) within it. The Ministry will continue to work closely with English Nature to achieve our shared environmental objectives throughout the area.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial resources are available to install new drainage structures which will permit raising of ditch water levels in the north Kent marshes environmentally sensitive area.

Mr. Curry: Eighty per cent. grants for the construction of bunds or sluices or other works to control water levels are available to farmers who have land under an environmentally sensitive area agreement. Where schemes are undertaken by drainage bodies grant aid may also be available under the Water Resources Act 1991 and the Land Drainage Act 1991.

Meat Products

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the average increases in the retail price of bacon, sausage and other meat-based food products sold in the United Kingdom year on year over the past five years.

Mr. Curry: The annual percentage increases over the last five years in retail prices, as measured by the retail prices index, are given:

Year (change on previous year)	Bacon	Other meat products (including sausages)
1988	+3·3	−0·6
1989	+9·3	+6·0
1990	+12·2	+11·3
1991	+1·4	+3·9
1992	+6·8	+0·5

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount of bacon, sausage and other meat-based food products (a) exported from and (b) imported into the United Kingdom year on year for the past five years.

Mr. Curry: The figures for trade in all meat preparations—which includes bacon and sausage—during the last five years are as follows:

	Exports		Imports
	Weight (MT.)	Value (£m)	Weight (MT.)	Value (£m)
1988	16,817	33·121	488,924	791·763
1989	18,006	37·868	492,847	936·193
1990	18,449	42·357	481,505	981·358
1991	23,398	54·737	488,013	989·969
1992	27,176	66·792	495,577	1,026·292

Source: Central Statistical Office MA 20 and MM20.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many companies are involved with the manufacture of bacon, sausage and other meat-based foods in the United Kingdom in total; and how many of those are based in (a) other EC countries and (b) non-EC countries.

Mr. Curry: Information is not available on the number of companies engaged in these activities or on their distribution according to the domicile of the controlling interest. However, at the end of 1992 there was 637 establishments in the United Kingdom classified as having a principal activity of bacon curing or the manufacture of meat products—heading 4122 of the standard industrial classification, revised 1980.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what volume of meat foods was manufactured in the United Kingdom in each year since 1988.

Mr. Curry: Comprehensive information on the volume of meat foods manufactured in the United Kingdom is not available. However, the value of sales of meat products by all establishments engaged in their manufacture is available and is shown below:

£ million

Year	Volume
1988	2,464
1989	2,545
1990	2,723
1991	2,832
1992	3,040

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the change in the level of consumption of manufactured meat foods in the United Kingdom in each year since 1988.

Mr. Curry: Information on the level of household consumption of manufactured meat foods—which includes bacon and ham, sausages, pies, canned or cooked meats and other meat products—is available from the national food survey.

Year	Household consumption in ounces per person per week
1988	15·97
1989	15·86
1990	15·03
1991	15·03
1992	15·41

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many people were employed in meat foods manufacturing in each year since 1988.

Mr. Curry: Information is not available for each of the years requested. Figures from the three most recent censuses of employment are shown:

Year to September	Great Britain ('000)
1987	50·9
1989	48·7
1991	52·1

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what volume of manufactured meat foods was sold in the retail market in the United Kingdom in each year since 1988.

Mr. Curry: Information is not available in the precise form requested. Consumers' household expenditure on manufactured meat foods—which includes bacon and ham, sausages, pies, canned or cooked meats and other meat products—at constant 1985 prices for the years in question is shown:

1988	3,555
1989	3,730
1990	3,593
1991	3,509
1992	3,651

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what provisions are in place to ensure fair competition in manufacturing and retailing of meat-based foods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I have been asked to reply.

The Government's policy is to promote competition throughout the economy. If the hon. Member has evidence of anti-competitive practices in the manufacturing and retailing of meat-based products, he should write to the Director General of Fair Trading who has responsibility, under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980, for investigating allegations of anti-competitive practices.

Cereal Output

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the level of EC cereal output in each year since 1990.

Mr. Curry: Based on European Commission statistical information, the level of EC cereal output in each year since 1990 in tonnes is as follows:

	Tonnes
1990	170,108,200
1991	181,034,800
1992	[1]167,902,800

[1] Provisional.

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the change in cereal output in the latest available year from the previous year in each EC country.

Mr. Curry: Based on European Commission statistical information, the table sets out the change in cereal output from 1990 to 1991 for each EC country

Country	Output (Tonnes)		Change (Tonnes)
	1990	1991
Belgium	1,996,100	1,979,300	−16,800
Denmark	9,606,000	9,169,000	−437,000
Germany	37,580,000	39,289,000	+1,709,000
Greece	4,042,000	5,607,400	+1,565,400
France	55,118,000	60,232,000	+5,114,000
Ireland	1,970,000	2,093,000	+123,000
Italy	16,286,000	18,202,000	+1,916,000
Luxembourg	125,800	137,600	+11,800
Netherlands	1,388,300	1,296,000	−92,300
United Kingdom	22,566,000	22,635,000	+69,000
Portugal	1,200,000	1,543,300	+343,300
Spain	18,230,000	18,851,200	+621,200

Peat-free Composts

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what incentives are available to the horticulture industry to use peat-free composts.

Mr. Curry: The incentive to use peat-free compost flows from the demands of the market.

Set-aside Land

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the operation of rotational set-aside in United Kingdom relative to other EC countries (a) in general and (b) in respect of reducing the threshold tonnage for cereal production; what is the Government's policy with regard to reducing the number of exempted farms; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: We have received a number of representations about various aspects of the set-aside arrangements under the arable area payments scheme. We have always argued that the threshold for the simplified scheme for small producers, which has no set-aside requirement, should be set at the lowest figure consistent with the need for a de minimis treatment of the very smallest producers.

Gangmasters

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the activities of gangmasters in the farming industry.

Mr. Curry: Gangmasters play a role in the recruitment of casual agricultural labour at certain times of the year. Like other employers of agricultural labour, they are subject to monitoring by the Ministry to ensure compliance with agricultural wages orders.

Cormorants

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cormorants were killed under licence to prevent serious damage to fisheries in (a) England and (b) Wales in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Soames: No cormorants have been killed under licence in Wales in the last 10 years. Details for England are as follows:

	Number
1983	12
1984	13
1985	14
1986	14
1987	19
1988	12
1989	11
1990	11
1991	18
1992	13
Total	137

Fisheries

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will initiate discussions with other EC fishing nations and the European Commission to ensure a reduction in the European fishing effort in British waters pari passu with that enforced by the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992.

Mr. Curry: Working group discussions on the implementation of the 1993-96 multi-annual guidance programmes are already taking place in Brussels. I assured the House last July that we would not reduce days at sea here unless we are satisfied that other member states are taking effective steps to meet their targets.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will suspend the implementation of the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1992.

Mr. Curry: No.

Food Hygiene

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure the effective application of the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1991.

Mr. Sackville: I have been asked to reply.

A statutory code of practice issued under section 40 of the Food Safety Act gives guidance to food authorities on the enforcement of the temperature control requirements contained in the Food Hygiene (Amendment) Regulations 1990 and 1991. This code sets out a staged approach to enforcement, with particular emphasis on educating and advising proprietors of food businesses. The Government have also published guidelines for enforcement authorities and the catering industry giving advice on the requirements of the regulations. In addition, officials have held meetings with representatives of the food industry to discuss the application of the regulations.

Farm Shops

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent farmers are permitted or encouraged to maximise the range of goods sold in their farm shops, including the buying in from wholesalers of other food and related products.

Mr. Baldry: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 26 April, Official Report, column 320. It will be for the local planning authority to take into account the advice in planning policy guidance note 7, together with all other material planning considerations, in reaching planning decisions on farm shops in the countryside.

DEFENCE

Bosnia

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 242, whether the United Nations has agreed to reimburse all the costs of British Forces in Bosnia, including the national support element; what will be the basis of calculation for charging the costs; whether British forces in Bosnia will be obliged to seek United Nations sanction for replacement items of equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Nations will reimburse costs for all British forces in Bosnia in accordance with established rules, in so far as contributions from member states allow. Our charges are calculated on an extra cost basis. From 1 April, the United Nations assumed responsibility for deciding operational requirements. Payments for any equipment replaced by the British forces will be made only with the prior agreement of the United Nations.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions are given to commanding officers in Bosnia with regard to contacts with the press.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Written guidelines are given to commanding officers in Bosnia. These guidelines are structured to help commanding officers, most of whom have no experience of the media or press, on how best to deal with press inquiries. These guidelines supplement those issued by the United Nations, which has overall responsibility for relations between the United Nations protection force in the former Yugoslavia and the media.

Laser-guided Bombs

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how he intends to meet the RAF's future requirements for laser-guided bombs.

Mr. Aitken: The 1992 Statement on the Defence Estimates—paragraph 421—noted the remarkable results achieved in Operation Granby by precision-guided munitions and that we were reviewing the mix of precision and non-precision munitions in the RAF's inventory. I am pleased to announce that my Department is today inviting tenders for the supply of new advanced low-level laser-guided bombs. These bombs will, in part, replace our existing Paveway II laser-guided bombs; they will be more flexible and accurate, and effective against a wider range of possible targets.

This competititive procurement is part of our programme to ensure that our armed forces continue to be provided with up-to-date and highly capable equipment.

Employment Costs

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the average daily costs attributable to the employment of (a) a lance corporal and (b) a trooper.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The average daily cost of a lance corporal is £107·30 and a trooper is £91·29.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy towards the reciprocated withdrawal of all sub-strategic nuclear weapons from the arsenals of NATO and Russia.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The alliance's strategic concept published in November 1991 makes clear that NATO continues to require sub-strategic nuclear forces, albeit at a significantly reduced level, as an essential link between conventional and strategic nuclear forces.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the planned Trident deployment is capable of accommodating both the United Kingdom's entire sub-strategic and strategic nuclear force requirements;

(2) if United Kingdom Trident submarines are capable of deploying missiles that are assigned a sub-strategic role alongside missiles that are assigned a strategic role, within the same submarine;

(3) what is his Department's policy towards the development of a stand-off capability for the United Kingdom's air-launched sub-strategic nuclear weapons;

(4) what assessment his Department has made as to the cost savings that would result from the deployment of the United Kingdom's sub-strategic nuclear capability within the Trident force deployment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We are continuing to study a range of possible options for our long-term sub-strategic nuclear capability, including the possible use of Trident in this role. An announcement will be made at the appropriate time.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's assessment of the implications of the collapse of the Warsaw treaty organisation for the operational effectiveness of the United Kingdom's air-launched sub-strategic nuclear force.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom's force of dual-capable aircraft remains fully capable of carrying out its sub-strategic nuclear role.

Nuclear Free-fall Bombs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the military rationale for the continued deployment of free-fall nuclear bombs by the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have a continuing need for a sub-strategic nuclear capability, as an essential link between conventional and strategic nuclear forces.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the means by which his Department will demonstrate to other countries that the recent reduction in the number of nuclear free-fall bombs deployed by the United Kingdom has been implemented.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In keeping with the practice of successive Governments, we do not make public detailed information on our nuclear stockpile size. The reduction of our free-fall bomb holdings by over a half is currently being implemented. The question of verification does not arise.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what improvements have been implemented to extend the operational life of the WE177 nuclear bomb beyond the 1990s.

Mr. Aitken: It is not in the interest of national security to discuss details of the configuration of nuclear weapons. However, the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb is expected to remain serviceable well into the first decade of the next century.

Polaris Submarines

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the information regarding the number of missiles and warheads deployed on the Polaris submarines when they first entered service was released into the public domain.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This information was first provided in defence open government document 87/01 "Trident and the Alternatives, Modernising the United Kingdom Strategic Nuclear Deterrent Force".

Married Quarters, Plymouth

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the sale of surplus married quarters at Mantle gardens, Barne Barton, Plymouth, to Devon and Cornwall housing association to be completed.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Devon and Cornwall housing association has requested that completion of the deal should be delayed. The properties are now being seriously damaged by vandals, however, and in order to protect the interests of the taxpayer and to ensure the early reuse of the dwellings, arrangements are now in hand to sell the estate on the open market.

Adriatic (Port Monitoring)

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the information available to him on the actions taken by NATO or the WEU monitoring forces in the Adriatic in relation to the passage to Montenegrin ports of each of the motor vessels Dimitrakis, Novotsak II and East River, showing the dates on which each was identified, challenged or boarded, and the purported port of destination.

Mr. Garel-Jones: I have been asked to reply.

MV Dimitrakis was boarded by a NATO monitoring vessel on 18 January 1993. It gave its port of destination as Koper—Slovenia—and was allowed to proceed. It then diverted to the Montenegrin port of Bar; on emerging, it was intercepted and towed to Brindisi for inspection.

MV Novotsak II was boarded by a Western European Union vessel on 23 January 1993. Having declared Venice as its port of destination, it was allowed to proceed. It then diverted to Bar, where it remains. We have asked the Russian authorities to take up the matter with the vessel's owners.

MV East River was intercepted, while stationary in international waters, by a NATO vessel on 11 March. It declared its port of destination as Venice. It claimed to have engine, gyro and radar problems; an offer of assistance was declined. Some hours later it was seen heading for Bar; NATO vessels were unable to prevent it reaching Montenegrin territorial waters. The Liberian authorities have suspended the ship's licences. We have asked the Greek authorities to pursue the matter with the ship's owners.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Education Grants

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many persons are receiving grants from each of the five area education boards to attend tertiary education institutions in Great Britain;

(2) how many persons are receiving grants from each of the five area education boards to attend tertiary education institutions in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Hanley: The number of awards made by each of the education and library boards, in the current academic year, in respect of attendance at tertiary education institutions in Great Britain and the Republic of Ireland is as follows:

Board	Great Britain Number	Republic of Ireland Number
Belfast	1,369	130
South Eastern	3,176	134
Western	2,097	221
North Eastern	2,646	72
Southern	1,923	235

Energy

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish a scheme for assisting pilot energy projects in Northern Ireland along the same lines as that operating in Great Britain.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 29 April, Official Report, column 474.

Road Schemes

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 270, what conclusions there were of the economic assessments for each of the 11 major road schemes referred to in that answer.

Mr. Atkins: As stated previously, the assessments showed that each scheme represented good value for money.

Students

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the sums paid for (a) students of the Republic of Ireland and (b) other EC countries studying at tertiary level in Northern Ireland for the past four years for which figures are available.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 April 1993]: Information on the breakdown between students from the Republic of Ireland and other EC countries is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost: £876,765 was paid in fees for students from EC countries in 1989-90; £2,616,822 in 1990-91; and £3,830,969 in 1991-92. The provisional figure for 1992-93 is £4,598,250.

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of the number of third-level student places required in Northern Ireland in 1995 up to the year 2000.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 April 1993]: It is estimated that the full-time equivalent places required for students on full-time and part-time higher education—undergraduate level—courses will be as follows:

	Number
1995-96	25,300
1996-97	25,900
1997-98	27,000
1998-99	28,300
1999-2000	29,800
2000-01	31,200

Higher Education Funding

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes he plans in the provision of funds for universities and colleges of education over the next three financial years.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 April 1993]: None. The Department of Education for Northern Ireland will continue to provide the funding for universities and colleges of education in Northern Ireland.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) chairmen and (b) board members of training and enterprise councils come from small firms.

Mr. McLoughlin: Records held centrally show that six training and enterprise council (TEC) chairmen and 127 TEC board members are from companies with 50 or fewer employees.

Employment Training

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when she will reply to the question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras of 22 April on the cost per trainee of employment training.

Mr. McLoughlin: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to him on 29 April 1993, Official Report, columns 499-500.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to her answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 843, what assessment she has made of the reason for the census in April 1981 recording fewer people unemployed and seeking work that the equivalent figure for the same date produced by her Department.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Department's definition of an unemployed person quite reasonably includes the criterion that he or she must be "actively" seeking work. The census of population does not include this criterion, which is why its figures are higher. This was the case in 1981 as well as in 1991.

Private Finance Initiative

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps her Department has taken to implement the private finance initiative announced in the autumn statement on 12 November 1992 and in the Treasury private finance guidance published on 9 December 1992.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The potential scope of the initiative will vary between Departments. This Department is examining the scope for involving the private sector in the ways suggested by the Treasury's interim guidance.

WALES

Trawsfynydd

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what volumes of (a) radioactive waste and (b) spent nuclear fuel are currently stored at the Trawsfynydd nuclear plant; what amounts of (i) radioactive waste and (ii) spent nuclear fuel have been transported from the plant for disposal or processing, respectively; and what visits have been made to the plant by Euratom safeguards inspectors since it opened.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The volumes of radioactive waste and spent fuel stored at and transported from Trawsfynydd are operational matters for Nuclear Electric. The precise number of inspections carried out at Trawsfynydd is a matter for the EC Euratom safeguards directorate and the operator. I understand, however, that the objectives of Euratom require that this type of plant should be inspected about three or four times each year.

Nursing Clinical Grades

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales by what date he expects all nursing clinical grading appeals to have been decided.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I expect appeals at the local level to be completed soon. As more appeals continue to come through to the Welsh and national—negotiating council —levels, I cannot forecast when all such appeals will be completed. A number of procedural changes aimed at significantly speeding up the appeals process are being discussed within the Nursing and Midwifery Staffs Negotiating Council.

Child Protection Registers

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information is available to his Department on the numbers of children included on child protection registers; and if he will indicate the level of disaggregation of the available data.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of children recorded on local authority child protection registers is published annually, showing numbers on the registers, additions and removals by category of abuse, age and sex.

A copy of the child protection register statistics for Wales in 1991 can be found in the Library of the House.

Rented Accommodation

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures are being taken to help Welsh local authorities improve the quality and quantity of privately rented accommodation.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: More than £16·5 million has been made available to local authorities in Wales over the last three years to support schemes to improve the quality and quantity of privately rented accommodation. These schemes involve improvements in the condition and management of rented homes, including houses in multiple occupation, and increases in the supply of homes through the conversion of under-utilised accommodation providing flats above shops, for example.

Inward Investment

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will break down into the category of jobs (a) created and (b) safeguarded, the total jobs he referred to as arising from inward investment in 1992-93 in his speech to the Council of Welsh Districts on economic development on Wednesday 21 April in Rhyl; and what information he can provide on the county-by-county location of such promised jobs also broken down by (i) created and (ii) safeguarded;

(2) if he will provide a county-by-county breakdown of the forecast expenditure figure of £949 million, referred to as arising from inward investment in 1992-93 in his speech to the Council of Welsh Districts on economic development on Wednesday 21 April in Rhyl.

Mr. David Hunt: The county-by-county breakdown of inward investment recorded for Wales during 1992-93 is as shown in the following schedule. The figures are based on information provided by companies at the time the projects were recorded and have not been amended to take account of subsequent developments.

County	New Jobs	Safeguarded Jobs	Total Jobs	Capital Expenditure
				(£ million)
Clwyd	1,579	835	2,414	332
Dyfed	132	875	1,007	106
Gwent	1,396	2,080	3,476	134
Gwynedd	618	391	1,009	26
Powys	653	95	748	7
Mid Glamorgan	1,206	1,672	2,878	126
South Glamorgan	785	959	1,744	181
West Glamorgan	258	324	582	37
Totals	6,627	7,231	13,858	949

Moles (Strychnine)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of permits issued by his Department's officials authorising the use of strychnine for mole control and the overall amount of strychnine used for mole control for each of the last five years.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Permits	Amount (gms)
1988	2,421	12,084
1989	2,239	11,289
1990	1,607	8,575
1991	1,489	6,789
1992	1,550	8,421

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Market Testing

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what procedures are followed to ensure that the equal opportunities policies of the civil service are maintained if a function or service is contracted out as part of the market testing programme.

Mr. Waldegrave: If, following a market testing exercise, a function or service is contracted out but the individuals carrying it out remain civil servants they will continue to be covered by civil service equal opportunities policies.

Where services are contracted out to private companies, the Government do not intend to require particular employment policies and practices and such requirements will not be included in tender documents. EC directives impose restrictions on the Government's ability to take account of non-commercial matters. Subject to these restrictions, Departments and agencies may wish to give prospective contractors the opportunity to provide information on their employment policies and practices, including equal opportunities, that such contractors may believe is relevant to their ability to fulfil the contract for which they are bidding.

Charterline

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the contract for the Charterline was awarded as a result of a competitive tendering exercise.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes.

Fourth Framework Document

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his response to the Commission's second working document on the fourth framework presented by Professor Ruberti.

Mr. Robert Jackson: The United Kingdom is in the process of preparing a response to the Commission's second working document on the EC's fourth framework programme for research and development, which will be placed in the House of Commons Library.

Astronomy

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what public funds have been devoted to the support of astronomy in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: Expenditure on astronomy by the Science and Engineering Research Council, including on related areas such as solar terrestrial physics and planetary science, has been as follows:

	£ million
1983-84	40·8
1984-85	46·3
1985-86	48·4
1986-87	47·0
1987-88	50·9
1988-89	60·0
1989-90	66·1
1990-91	62·6
1991-92	66·8
1992-93	72·7

Resources spent by universities on astronomy from funds provided by the higher education funding councils are not separately identifiable.

SCOTLAND

Paintball

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of people employed (a) full time and (b) part time in the sport of paintball in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: Relevant information is not held centrally to enable such an estimate to be made.

Homelessness

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are his plans for dealing with homelessness among 16 to 21-year-olds;

(2) if he will establish an inquiry into homelessness among young people.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Local authorities have the statutory responsibility for dealing with homelessness. Almost £23 million in extra capital allocations have been made available to local authorities over the financial years 1991-93 to help the homeless. The first £15 million was aimed specifically at young, single homeless people. In addition, £150,000 has been made available over three years under the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 for the development of projects to support young, single homeless people in Scottish cities who are roofless or at risk of becoming so and to reduce the risk of them moving to London.

We commissioned, and published in February, the report of the Glasgow university study, "Homeless and Young People in Scotland", and are consulting widely on its recommendations. Our current review of the code of guidance on homelessness will include interviews with homeless applicants, including young people; and the parallel survey of housing authorities' policy and procedures will also cover young people.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many 16 to 21-year-olds last year were turned away from temporary accommodation projects; and what is his latest estimate of the number of 16 to 21-year-olds sleeping rough;

(2) how many 16 to 21-year-olds have declared themselves homeless to local authorities and voluntary organisations in each year since 1985.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on those turned away from temporary accommodation is not collected centrally. The available information on the numbers sleeping rough is due to be published later this month in the 1991 census report for Scotland, part 1.

The available information on households applying to local authorities is published in the statistical bulletins "Operation of the Homeless Persons Legislation in Scotland 1979-80 to 1990-91" (HSG/1992/1) and "Operation of the Homeless Persons Legislation in Scotland 1980-81 to 1991-92" (HSG/1992/6), both of which are available in the House Library. No information is collected from voluntary agencies on this matter.

University of Edinburgh Dental School

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many redundancies are to take place in 1993 and 1994 at the University of Edinburgh dental school.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Decisions relating to personnel requirements, including redundancies, are a matter for the University of Edinburgh as employer of the staff concerned.

Departmental Crofts

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those parts of his Department's crofting estate, other than house sites, which have been sold by his Department in each of the past five years, with acreages and purchases in each case.

Sir Hector Monro: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Summary—number of sales from crofting estates 1988-1992

Year	Sales to Sitting Tenants		Sales to Third Parties
	Number	Hectarage	Number	Hectarage

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many special educational needs appeals are currently lodged with his Department under section 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980; what was the date on which each was received by his Department; and when he expects to give his decisions.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 27 April 1993]: My Department has before it 28 outstanding complaints under section 70 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 made to the Secretary of State about provision for special educational needs. Of these, 24 were lodged in 1991, two in 1992 and two in 1993.

Delays have been caused by the exceptional receipt of 47 complaints in 1991 compared with the usual average of three per year.

Decisions will be issued on all oustanding cases as soon as possible. One of these cases concerns one of the hon. Member's constituents. Subject to receipt of a response awaited from the education authority I expect the decision to be made in May.

Housing

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to give special financial assistance to the housing estates within Glasgow, Pollok, constituency.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 27 April 1993]: Glasgow district council's housing revenue account capital allocation for investment in council housing in 1993-94 is £87·045 million. It is for the council to determine its own priorities for the use of these substantial resources in the light of local circumstances, including investment in housing estates in the Pollok area if this is seen as a priority. In addition, Scottish Homes plans to invest £9·515 million in Pollok in 1993-94 through expenditure on its own stock, grants to housing associations and private sector housing providers. The bulk of this will be for rented housing and will enable site starts to be made on approximately 260 housing units. The urban programme is also currently funding a variety of projects in Pollok which are sponsored by Strathclyde regional council and Glasgow district council, including industrial improvements, addiction care and neighbourhood and business centres which total £1·285 million in capital costs and £587,000 in annual running costs.

Smear Tests

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if the terms of reference of the independent inquiry into the carrying out of smear tests at Inverclyde will include consideration of latest technologies available for checking slides;

(2) if the terms of reference of the independent inquiry into the carrying out of smear tests at Inverclyde will include the drawing up of a list of safeguards to ensure that the work is carried out to the highest possible standard.

Mr. Lang: The terms of reference of the independent inquiry are as follows:

To inquire into the circumstances which led to a review of 20,000 cervical smear test results for the period 1987 to early 1992 undertaken at Inverclyde hospital laboratory.

To report to the Minister of State and make recommendations.

These terms will enable the inquiry team to take account of all relevant matters and to make the recommendations which they consider appropriate. The matters to which you refer will be drawn to the attention of the inquiry team.

The membership of the inquiry team is as follows:

Chairperson
Dr. Euphemia McGoogan, senior lecturer in pathology, university of Edinburgh.
Member
Dr. Elizabeth Hudson, consultant cytopathologist, Northwick Park hospital, Middlesex.

The non-medical members are:
Ms Leeona Dorrian, advocate, Edinburgh.
Professor Nick Day, professor of public health, university of Cambridge.

Water and Sewerage

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to continue not to allow disconnections of domestic water supply in Scotland following reorganisation of water and sewerage services.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 14 December 1992 at column 79.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will carry out an assessment of the impact on (a) renal dialysis users and (b) people suffering from incontinence of the reorganisation of water and sewerage services in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: No decision on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland has been taken. All relevant factors will be taken into account, once a decision has been taken.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total estimated expenditure necessary to bring water and sewerage standards in Scotland into line with all EC waste and water directives; and what is the likely time scale for carrying out that work.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Estimated expenditure on these directives totals £2·5 billion over the next 15 years.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the CBI, the Scottish Council for Development and Industry and the National Federation of Small Businesses regarding the reorganisation of the water and sewerage services in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: My right hon. Friend has held no such meetings.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment has been made of the impact of the reorganisation of water and sewerage services in Scotland on (a) manufacturing and (b) service industries.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: An objective of restructuring the water and sewerage services in Scotland is to achieve an efficient service at the lowest reasonable cost to both industrial and domestic consumers.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland in what way the future employment of people working in the water and sewerage service in Scotland is included in the assessment of options at present being undertaken; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: As the consultation paper "Investing for Our Future" made clear, staffing considerations will be taken fully into account in working out the detailed arrangements for the future of the services.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the British Medical Association and the British Association of Social Workers about the reorganisation of the water and sewerage services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The British Medical Association responded to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future" and its response is on open file in St. Andrew's house library in Edinburgh. A copy can be obtained through the Library of the House. No representations have been received from the British Association of Social Workers.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current time scale for the reorganisation of the water and sewerage service in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The intention is that the reorganisation of water and sewerage services will proceed in parallel with the reform of local government.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what amounts are included in the 1993-94 estimates, and the estimated expenditure for 1994-95 and 1995-96, for the reorganisation of the water and sewerage services in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Provision of £400,000 has been made in the current year to meet the costs of any further consultancy work which may be commissioned in connection with water and sewerage restructuring.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the consultants commissioned to carry out work on the options for the future of the water and sewerage service in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Quayle Munro Ltd.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the White Paper on the future of the water and sewerage services in Scotland will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: I will announce my decision on the future of water and sewerage services in Scotland in due course.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what level of cost-benefit analysis, efficiency audits and quality standards assessments have taken place in relation to the proposed reorganisation of the water and sewerage services in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Reform of local government will require reorganisation of the water and sewerage services. The consultation paper "Investing For Our Future" set out eight options. These are being examined in the light of responses to the consultation paper. The objective is to put in place a structure which is capable of providing services of the highest quality, at lowest reasonable cost to the consumer and which can maintain and improve safeguards for the environment.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the CBI about the reorganisation of water and sewerage services in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The CBI responded to the consultation paper "Investing For Our Future", and its response is on open file in St. Andrew's house library in Edinburgh. A copy can be obtained through the Library of the House.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the full cost of the work done in the options for the future of the water and sewerage service in Scotland; and what were the costs of (a) the Quayle Munro consultancy, (b) the preparation, printing and publication of the consultative document, (c) other consultancy costs, (d) legal advice on the feasibility of the options being considered and (e) in-house costs.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The costs incurred on work on the options for the future structure of water and sewerage services in Scotland are as follows:

(a) The total cost of consultancy work undertaken by Quayle Munro Ltd. is £101,602. The original contract price was £50,000 as announced in my reply given to the hon. Member on 26 October 1992, Official Report, columns 530-31. Since the report was submitted and used in the preparation of the consultation paper "Investing for our Future", further follow-up work has been commissioned and undertaken. The cost of this work was £51,602. These figures exclude value added tax.

(b) Printing and publication of the consultation paper "Investing for our Future" cost £11,838, including value added tax.

(c) No other consultancy costs have been incurred.

(d) No external legal advice has been obtained.

(e) The running costs of the division in the Scottish Office which deals with water and sewerage restructuring were £133,020 in 1992-93. Provision of £387,480 has been made to meet the costs of staff working full time on this policy during 1993-94. Other staff work on this from time to time; it is not possible to provide an accurate figure at this time of the costs associated with their work.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the privatised water companies which have expressed an interest to his office on the issue of the future of Scotland's water and sewerage service.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 29 April 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) on 18 March 1993 at column 390.

ENVIRONMENT

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to take account of the wider economic and social case when he considers the report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution on the public consultation process on the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield.

Mr. Maclean: All relevant considerations will be taken into account.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the external legal opinion obtained by his Department on the HMIP public consultation process on Sellafield's radioactive discharges and the THORP project.

Mr. Maclean: In line with the Government's usual practice, I do not intend to publish the legal opinion referred to.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to ensure that the Housing Corporation purchases land at a price fixed by valuation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Housing Corporation has the power, under section 88 of the Housing Associations Act 1985, to purchase land for certain purposes. However, it is its current policy, and has been for some time, not to do so. My Department has no proposals to encourage the corporation to do so.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 25 March concerning a constituent.

Mr. Baldry: I replied to the hon. Member's letter on Thursday 29 April.

Community Charge

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much community charge was outstanding to local authorities on 31 March; and if he will give details of the amount outstanding to each local authority.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 29 April 1993]: I will make an estimate of the level of community charge arrears for all local authorities at 31 March 1993 once collection figures for the fourth quarter of 1992-93 are available. There is insufficient information available centrally to make a reliable estimate for each local authority. However, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy regularly publishes estimates for individual authorities: figures for 31 March 1991 and 31 March 1992 are available in the Library of the House.

HEALTH

Personal Social Services

12. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on implementation of the reductions in central Government personal social services expenditure in 1993-94.

Mr. Yeo: Central Government support for local authority personal social services is not being reduced in 1993-94. Overall standard spending this year, including the special transitional grant for community care, is £5,585 million, an increase of 15 per cent. on 1992-93.

26. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she last met representatives of the Association of Directors of Social Services to discuss the provision of personal social services during the current financial year.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I met representatives of the Association of Directors of Social Services on 26 April.

Consultancies

13. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much was spent by regional health authorities on consultancies in the year 1992-93.

Mr. Sackville: We do not collect information specifically on the cost of consultancies. However, expenditure on "contract staffing and consultancy services" by the 14 regional health authorities was some £27 million in 1991-92. This does not include expenditure at district level.

NHS Trusts

14. Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for health what changes she is planning to the consultation precedure leading to the establishment of NHS trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to improve the public accountability of NHS trusts; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Every year each national health service trust issues a summary business plan and annual report, makes its accounts publicly available and holds a public meeting. In addition, the trusts issue a strategic plan every three years. This is a minimum requirement which many trusts exceed. It represents a high level of public accountability which requires no improvement.

Feathers Project

15. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how projects to help mental health patients and other invalids, such as the Feathers project, are funded by her Department; and what plans she has to increase the number of such projects.

Mr. Yeo: There are various schemes of grant support, including the mental illness specific grant, available for such projects. The level of funding under these schemes is reviewed annually.

Waiting Lists

16. Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the current position on hospital waiting lists.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend gave the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) earlier today.

21. Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the average time which patients had to wait for treatment (a) in March 1988 and (b) in March 1992.

Mr. Sackville: The latest data on patients admitted for treatment show 50 per cent. were admitted immediately and of those who were admitted from waiting lists half had waited less than five weeks. The average waiting time of patients on waiting lists has fallen from nine months in March 1988 to five months in March 1992.

22. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients are waiting more than two years for surgery in the Worcester district health authority.

Mr. Sackville: None. Provisional figures show that there were no patients waiting more than a year in the Worcester district health authority as at 31 March 1993.

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS patients had waited for treatment for over a year in the North Western region (a) in March 1991 and (b) in the latest month for which figures are available; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Latest provisional figures for 31 December 1992 show that since March 1991 the number of patients waiting for more than a year in North Western region has fallen by 48 per cent. from 14,078 to 7,332. In England over the same period the number waiting over a year fell by 52 per cent. to 80,585—the lowest figure ever recorded.

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS patients had waited for treatment for over a year in the South West Thames region (a) in March 1991 and (b) in the latest month for which figures are available; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Latest provisional figures for 31 December 1992 show that since March 1991 the number of patients waiting for more than a year in the South West Thames region has fallen by 62 per cent. from 8,969 to 3,383.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made towards the patients charter guarantee that from 31 March no one should wait more than 18 months for a hip or knee joint replacement or a cataract operation.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The guarantee has been successfully introduced. Reports from regions indicate that at 31 March 1993 there were no patients waiting more than 18 months for a hip replacement or a cataract operation and only eight patients waiting more than 18 months for a knee replacement. We are pressing the regions involved to ensure that these patients are treated immediately.

Private Investment

17. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's policy on private investment in the health service.

Mr. Sackville: The national health service is encouraged to use private finance where it gives the best value for money, so that public funds go further in buying services for NHS patients. Business cases for schemes above £10 million need central approval and those between £1 million and £10 million need regional approval, with sampling at national level.

Community Care

18. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to assess the ability of local authority social services departments to meet their statutory functions under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Yeo: Implementation of the community care reforms will be thoroughly monitored and evaluated. Regional health authorities and the social services inspectorate will monitor the progress made by authorities in a series of sample studies and a comprehensive round of monitoring in the autumn. A national users and carers group will also help to give users and carers perspective on the progress made. A research programme will evaluate the effect of the reforms. We will continue to receive detailed statistical and financial information. The Audit Commission is also undertaking its own monitoring.

28. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of progress of the community care reforms in Leicestershire; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Our new community care arrangements came into operation in all parts of the country on 1 April. It is now for local health and social services authorities to make use of the opportunities they present. Our monitoring showed Leicestershire to be well prepared to take on its new opportunities to give users and carers a better service.

Junior Doctors

19. Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to bring forward the date for achieving the target of an average of 72 hours per week for junior doctors.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Mayday Hospital, Croydon

20. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the level of income for the Mayday health care trust hospital, Croydon, in 1992-93; and what is the projected level of income for 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total income for the Mayday health care national health service trust in 1992-93 is forecast as £63,382,000. The trust is projecting a total income of £62,262,000 for 1993-94.

Adoption

23. Mr. Jonathan Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received in respect of the review of adoption law.

Mr. Yeo: The review received a general welcome. A total of 170 organisations and 179 individuals responded to the public consultation. All comments received have been given careful consideration in drawing up proposals for future legislation.

GP Fund Holders

24. Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the cost-effectiveness of general practitioner fund holding.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioner fund holding represents excellent value for money, with improvements to patient care being delivered innovatively and efficiently.

25. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner fund-holding practices are in operation in the South East Thames region; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Eighty-eight.

Prescription Charges

27. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations her Department has received regarding the payment for prescription charges by youth training scheme trainees.

Dr. Mawhinney: In the last 12 months we have received nine letters from hon. Members and one letter from a member of the public.

General Practitioners (London)

29. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners there are in Greater London.

Dr. Mawhinney: At 1 October 1992—the latest date for which figures are available—there were 3,810 general medical practitioners in Greater London. This figure is still provisional.

Coventry and Warwickshire Hospital

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of Coventry district health authority's latest proposals for Coventry and Warwickshire hospital; and what estimate has been made of the reduction in staff involved in the proposals.

Dr. Mawhinney: These are matters for Coventry district health authority and Walsgrave hospitals national health service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. A. R. Guy, the chairman of Coventry district health authority, for details.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what consultation process the proposals of Coventry district health authority for Coventry and Warwickshire hospital are required to be subject; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Community Health Council Regulations 1985 (SI No. 304) require a district health authority to consult the community health council over any proposals it has for substantial variations to services. Coventry district health authority is about to begin such an exercise in respect of Coventry and Warwickshire hospital.

Krypton Gas

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library copies of the results of research commissioned since 1978 by her Department on the possible health effects of the discharge of krypton gas into the environment.

Mr. Sackville: The National Radiological Protection Board has issued a number of publications which contain estimates of the collective exposures arising from routine discharges of radionuclides from United Kingdom sites: krypton 85 is among the radionuclides considered. The most recent of these is "NRPB-R231, Radiological impact of routine discharges from UK civil nuclear sites" published in 1990, a copy of which is in the Library.

Drug Prescribing

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of the Pact system of monitoring prescribing in general practice in each of the last 10 years.

Dr. Mawhinney: Prescription analysis and cost (Pact) is an operational system of the Prescription Pricing Authority which was introduced in August 1988. The cost of operating the Pact system cannot be identified separately.

Abortions

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of abortions which have now been performed under the provisions of the Abortion Acts; and how many and what percentage of those abortions were performed in emergency to save the life of the mother.

Mr. Sackville: A total of 3,591,618 legal abortions have been notified to the chief medical officers of England and Wales under the provisions of the Abortion Act 1967—this covers the period from the time when the Act came into force on 27 April 1968 until 31 March 1992, the latest date for which figures, provisional, are available. Of these, 136 —0·004 per cent.—were performed in emergency "to save the life of the pregnant woman".

NHS Supplies Authorities

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many national health service trusts use, partly or entirely, suppliers other than the National Health Service Supplies Authority; and what is the difference in their costs from those which would be incurred if they used the authority for all supplies.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

High Security Care

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to review the future of Rampton and Broadmoor hospitals.

Mr. Yeo: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 25 March at column 695.

Social Services, Greenwich

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her estimate of the change in standard spending assessment for social services in Greenwich if the 1991 census information were used for 1993-94.

Mr. Yeo: Population data from the 1991 census have already been incorporated in standard spending assessments (SSAs) for 1993-94. If information on social factors from the 1981 census were to be replaced by that available from the 1991 census, the SSA for personal social services for Greenwich for 1993-94 would increase by 9·8 per cent. The current review of SSAs will involve a number of further changes and may result in a different outcome when it is completed later this year.

Women Specialists

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on her proposals to increase the number of women specialists.

Mr. Sackville: An increase in the number of women consultants is one of the goals of the Government's Opportunity 2000 initiative. Guidance has been issued on equal opportunities in the recruitment and selection of medical staff and objectives have been set for health authorities and trusts relating to the monitoring of candidates and the provision of training and guidance for chairs and other members of appointments committees. Steps are being taken to provide improved opportunities for flexible working and training—a report by the joint working party on flexible training is shortly to be published—and the reduction in the number of hours for which junior doctors are contracted will also make it easier for women with domestic commitments to undertake higher specialist training. In the surgical specialities, where the proportion of women is particularly low, the Department is providing funding to promote the women in surgical training scheme.

Drug and Alcohol Misuse

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received concerning her decision to lift the ring-fence on grants to social services departments for drug and alcohol services; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from organisations providing residential drug and alcohol projects concerning the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from organisations providing residential drug and alcohol projects concerning the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Yeo: The Department has received a number of representations from projects providing residential care for alcohol and drug misusers about the changes introduced by this Act. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have both also met the national voluntary organisations representing alcohol and drug misuse services, leading service providers and representatives of local authority associations to discuss the changes.

Dentistry

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if there will be a decrease in her Department's contribution to the cost of dental treatment for non-exempt adults in the forthcoming year.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information will not be available until the financial year 1993-94 is complete.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many family health services authorities have been unable to provide emergency dental services in each week since 20 November 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The information is contained in the table. General dental practitioners have an obligation under their terms of service to provide emergency cover to their registered patients. They may also offer emergency treatment to non-registered patients. Family health services authorities make arrangements for those patients who are not registered.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have contacted each FHSA asking for help in finding a dentist in each week since 20 November 1992; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The information is contained in the tables.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have reported to each FHSA that they have been unable to arrange NHS dental treatment in each week since 20 November 1992; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Since week ending 27 November 1992 only one family health services authority (FHSA), Norfolk, has reported that they have been unable to arrange treatment for some patients. The number of patients each week is contained in the table. The number of patients they have been unable to assist has been decreasing steadily from a high of 228 in week ending 26 March 1993 to 98 in week ending 23 April 1993. The FHSA is satisfied that national health service dental treatment can now be arranged for all patients requesting it.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many FHSAs have referred patients who have been unable to obtain treatment from a general dental practitioner to (a) the community dental service, (b) the hospital dental service and (c) a salaried dentist, in each week since July 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The information is not held in the form requested. The number of family health services authorities which have referred patients who have been unable to obtain treatment from a general dental practitioner in the community dental service, hospital dental service or a salaried dentist is shown in the table.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dentists have given written notice to each FHSA to remove their names from the dental list since 20 November; and what is the total for this period.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 29 April 1993]: The information requested is contained in the table. The total number of dentists who have given written notice to family health services authorities to remove their names from the dental list since 20 November is 56. At 31 December 1992, the latest information held, there were 15,280 dentists in England compared with 15,308 at 31 December 1991.

Specialist Training

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Government's proposals for specialist training and accreditation.

Dr. Mawhinney: A working group was established last year by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to consider the current system of specialist medical training in this country in the light of the European Community medical directives. The group has completed its work and presented its report. This makes wide-ranging recommendations which, if implemented, would have major implications for the way in which we train our doctors and provide health care to patients in national health service hospitals. We have, therefore, decided to seek the widest possible range of views on the recommendations before any decisions are reached. The report is being issued today for consultation. Copies will be placed in the Library.

NHS Staff (Redundancies)

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions have been made in each regional health authority for staff redundancy payments in 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. No specific budget would be allocated to regional health authorities for redundancy payments; any such costs would be met from their overall allocation.

Nurses

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many nurses are currently employed in the national health service; at what average salary; and what were the equivalent figures in 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The number of nurses and midwives—whole-time equivalents—employed in the national health service at 30 September 1991 and at 30 September 1979, excluding agency staff, are as follows:

	Adjusted
[1]1979	378,050
1991	392,200

[1] The 1979 figure has been adjusted to reflect the fact that in 1980-81 the working week reduced from 40 to 37·5 hours.

An estimated average annual nurse's salary is £14,560 with effect from 1 April 1992. This figure represents the basic staff nurse (scale D) earnings. There is no comparable figure available for 1979.

AIDS

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people to date in the United Kingdom are recorded as having died from AIDS exclusively as a result of heterosexual activity.

Mr. Sackville: In the United Kingdom up to 31 March 1993, 349 deaths from AIDS had been recorded where the probable mode of transmission was heterosexual intercourse.

Mr. Mohammed Saeed

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will appoint an independent inquiry to investigate the circumstances in which Mohammed Saeed practised as a general practitioner in Bradford although unqualified, and on the handling of complaints about Mr. Saeed during this time; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The circumstances surrounding the case have been thoroughly investigated by the courts and the Department, and I do not consider that any purpose would be served by appointing an independent inquiry.

Children's Hospices

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what grants were made to children's hospices by health authorities in the financial year 1992-93; if she will list the hospices to which grants were made and the amounts given; what she expects the total amount allocated to such hospices in the current financial year to be; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: This information is not available centrally.

National health service management executive letter EL(93)14, a copy of which is available in the Library, explains our intention that in future both adult and children's hospices should be supported within the general system of health service funding through the contracts which health authorities and fund-holding general practitioners make with providers in both the NHS and voluntary sectors.

Health Managers

Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost of performance-related pay for senior management to date in each English health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Condensation

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been commissioned into illness resulting from condensation in the home; and what is the estimated cost to the health service each year of such illnesses.

Mr. Sackville: The Department has commissioned no such research.

Listeria

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many listeria cases were reported in 1992; and what assessment she has made of the effects of initiatives to combat the condition.

Mr. Sackville: In 1992, 112 cases of listeriosis in England and Wales were reported to the public health laboratory service. This figure is provisional.

Listeriosis in this country remains a rare disease and its incidence has declined significantly since 1988, when there were 288 cases. The Chief Medical Officer continues to advise pregnant women and the immuno-compromised to avoid high risk foods such as pâté and soft ripened cheeses. Advice about safe eating is kept under review.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she has taken to assess the ability of local authority social services departments to meet their statutory functions in relation to community care for disabled people.

Mr. Yeo: The preparations of every local authority social services department, for the third stage of the Government's community care reforms which were implemented on 1 April 1993, were regularly monitored by the Department's social services inspectorate. We will continue to monitor the performance of all local authorities in implementing community care over the next year, and make a special study of the implications for disabled people in a sample of authorities.

London Health Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will provide a breakdown of the sources of funding to be used to improve primary and community health facilities in London; and if she will make a statement;

(2) if she will publish a table showing the total sums allocated from existing regional health authority budgets to pay for primary and community health care initiatives in London; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Funding of primary care developments in London will be resourced from a combination of central funds together with a shift over time in the balance of existing funding in the Thames regions towards primary care, as suggested in "Making London Better". In 1993-94 these funds will amount to £40 million.

In addition, the Government are making available £2·5 million from funds for centrally financed services to resource new voluntary sector initiatives in 1993-94, and will maintain funding at this level in 1994-95 and 1995-96. A further £1 million from central funds is being made available to launch the primary care challenge fund in 1993-94.

This total of £43·5 million is additional to what would otherwise have been spent on primary care in London this year.

Further details of the funding arrangements for 1993-94 will be announced shortly when the London implementation group has made public its decisions on the development plans produced by family health services authorities within the London initiative zone.

Funding arrangements for the main primary care development programmes will be kept under review, year by year, as primary care plans are firmed up and acute sector reconfiguration proceeds. The Government are committed to investing £170 million of additional expenditure on capital projects in the London initiative zone over the next six years from 1993-94 and to ensuring that there is associated revenue investment to bring London's primary care services up to an appropriate standard by the end of the century.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the money earmarked for investment in primary health facilities in London in 1993-94 is additional to the funds earmarked for the NHS in the Chancellor's autumn statement; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: None. The funding for the national health service in 1993-94 announced in the Chancellor's autumn statement anticipated the need to increase investment in primary health facilities in London as part of the implementation of "Making London Better". Private finance will be considered as a source of additional funds where it can be demonstrated to be a cost effective way of improving services to NHS patients.

Vitamin K

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what future discussions are planned between the Medicines Control Agency and representatives of the pharmaceutical industry about the development of an oral preparation of vitamin K.

Dr. Mawhinney: Details of any discussions between the Medicines Control Agency and representatives of the pharmaceutical industry in relation to applications for product licences are not disclosed for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

Meat Products

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many registered premises were available for the manufacturing of meat foods to be sold in the retail market in the United Kingdom in each year since 1988;

(2) how many registered premises that manufactured meat foods for the retail market in the United Kingdom have closed in each year since 1988.

Mr. Sackville: Premises producing meat-based products were required to register with local authorities under the Food Act 1984. This requirement was superseded by the requirement in the Food Premises (Registration) Regulations 1991 that all premises used for food business, including those producing meat foods, are liable to be registered with the local food authority. In neither case are details held centrally.

HOME DEPARTMENT

British National Party

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he routinely receives from the Metropolitan police on the membership and activities of the British National party.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None.

Civil Defence Regulations

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what arrangements he has made to issue draft new Civil Defence (Grant) Regulations for consultation; when the draft was circulated for consultation; to whom the draft was circulated for consultation; what was the date notified for the submission of comments on the proposals; what comments his Department has received on his draft proposals; if he will list those organisations and individuals that submitted comments; what plans he has to issue revised proposals; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make it his policy in any forthcoming civil defence regulations to place a duty upon local authorities to consult with any body or organisation specified in directions given to them by the designated Minister;

(3) if he will make it his policy in any forthcoming civil defence regulations to place a duty upon local authorities to consult with bodies other than local authorities in the making of emergency plans;

(4) what arrangements he has made to issue draft new Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations for consultation; when the draft was circulated for consultation; to whom the draft was circulated for consultation; what was the date notified for the submission of comments on the proposals; what comments his Department has received on the draft proposals; if he will list those organisations and individuals that submitted comments; what plans he has to issue revised proposals; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he will make it his policy in any forthcoming civil defence regulations to give local authorities the power to take preparatory steps to implement emergency plans without having received a request from the designated Minister;

(6) if he will make it his policy in any forthcoming civil defence regulations to place a duty upon local authorities to arrange for the training of persons other than local authority staff;

(7) if he will make it his policy in any forthcoming civil defence regulations to place a duty upon local authorities to plan for mitigating the effects of occurrences involving destruction of or danger to life or property other than those designated as emergencies or disasters;

(8) if he will ensure that any new civil defence regulations introduced in England and Wales are consistent with those proposed to be introduced in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Draft Civil Defence (Grant) (Amendment) Regulations and (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations were issued in England and Wales on 3 December 1992 for comments to be received by 22 January 1993. They were sent to the Association of County Councils, Association of Metropolitan Authorities, Association of London Authorities, London Boroughs Association, Association of District Councils, chief executives of county councils, London boroughs and metropolitan districts, the town clerk of the Corporation of London, clerks to the fire and civil defence authorities, the Society of Local Authority Chief Executives, county Emergency Planning Officers Society, Society of Industrial Emergency Services Officers, National Council for Civil Protection, Emergency Planning Association and the civil protection co-ordination group.

Comments have been received, and considered from the local authority associations, some 30 chief executives, the other organisations and also from the Institute of Civil Defence and Disaster Studies, Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, British Red Cross and National Voluntary Aids Society.

The draft Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations will be laid before Parliament for approval as soon as possible and will be made available for information to those who were consulted. Following the consultations, it is not proposed to proceed with the draft Civil Defence (Grant) (Amendment) Regulations.

I propose to include provision in the draft regulations requiring local authorities to comply with any directions which are given by the designated Minister in the exercise of their functions, including consultation; for relevant local authorities and, where appropriate, fire and civil defence authorities only to be consulted in the making of plans; for local authorities, where they think it appropriate, to take preparatory steps to implement plans without a request from the designated Minister; and for local authorities to arrange training of persons other than their own staff.

A duty requiring plans for mitigating the effects of occurrences involving destruction of or danger to life or property will not be included. Local authorities will however be encouraged to develop broadly based plans which will enable them to respond to all kinds of emergencies.

The principles of the draft regulations will be consistent with those for Scotland.

MDEA

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what communication he has had with his Netherlands opposite number about the drug MDEA; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: My Department has raised with the Dutch enforcement agencies and at official level our concern at the amount of MDEA of Dutch origin which is seized in the United Kingdom. I shall study the reports resulting from these contacts with great care.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list nationals of the former Yugoslavia by country of origin, living in the United Kingdom, to the latest date, under their immigration status; how many have (a) applied to vary their permission to remain in the United Kingdom and (b) have lodged appeals against refusal to remain in the United Kingdom and are awaiting decisions on applications to remain in the United Kingdom;

(2) how many nationals of the former Yugoslavia are living in the United Kingdom; if he will list the numbers by country of origin; and how many have entered the United Kingdom since 1990.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information on total passenger admissions from the former Yugoslavia in the years 1990-92 is given in the table.

Nationals of the former Yugoslavia given leave to enter the United Kingdom[1]

	Number of persons
1990	69,700
1991	59,800
1992	[2]50,100

[1]The majority were visitors who were given leave to enter for up to six months.

[2]Provisional figure.

Comprehensive reliable information on embarkations is not available.

In the period January 1992 to March 1993 inclusive, around 6,300 nationals of the former Yugoslavia—excluding dependants—applied for asylum in the United Kingdom, 2,220 at ports on arrival and 4,080 after entry. The large majority of these applications are still under consideration.

Comprehensive information on recent applications to vary leave is not yet available. For information on decisions in 1992 on variation of leave applications I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 22 March 1993, column 448.

Information about appeals against refusals of variation of leave applications is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prison Transport

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the deaths that have occurred in cellular vans over the last 10 years, citing name, place, date and inquest result; and if he will make a statement on the circumstances.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Cellular vans are used by both police and prison services.

I understand from the director general of the Prison Service that no deaths have occurred in cellular vans used by the Prison Service or by a firm contracted by the Prison Service to provide escort services.

One death has occurred in a cellular vehicle used by the police. On 19 June 1989, Mr. Terence O'Shea, a 43-year-old remand prisoner, died in a Lancashire constabulary prisoner transport vehicle while in transit between Blackpool magistrates court and Her Majesty's remand centre, Risley. Staff had checked Mr. O'Shea's cell at various times en route, but he was found to be collapsed on arrival at destination. A police surgeon had certified him fit to be detained although he was suffering from alcohol withdrawal symptoms. Cause of death was heatstroke. At the inquest a verdict of accidental death was recorded.

Laboratory Animals

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in setting a target date after which the use of wild-caught primates in British research laboratories will be prohibited.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We have already made substantial progress towards phasing out the use of wild-caught primates in British laboratories, and are discussing a Community-wide approach to this issue with our EC partners. The matter will be raised again later in the year at the meeting of EC national competent authorities established under directive 86/609/EEC.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider implementing a formal training programme for unlicensed junior laboratory technicians dealing with laboratory animals.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Home Office code of practice makes it clear that all those responsible for laboratory animals must be properly trained and competent, and that it is the responsibility of the named day-to-day care person to ensure that adequate training is provided for all personnel.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has considered the complaints made against Wickham Research Laboratories about breaches of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986; and what action he intends to take on them.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have carefully considered a detailed report by the Home Office inspectorate carried out following allegations made about the conduct of animal procedures at Wickham research laboratories, but it would be inappropriate for me to disclose details at this stage until the results of the investigation have been communicated to Wickham research laboratories and it has had the opportunity to comment.

Forensic Science Service Agency

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what targets he has set for the Forensic Science Service Agency for 1993-94.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: During 1993-94 I shall expect the FSS to continue to improve its effectiveness and efficiency. The financial targets are recovery of full economic costs, a unit cost of £452 with an efficiency gain of 1·6 per cent. The service level targets are to improve turnround times on average by 12 per cent. over 1992-93 meeting specific target dates for seven types of offence, and to achieve accreditation to the national measurement accreditation service and BS5750 standards in all six operational laboratories.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Service

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost, including redundancy payments, incurred by his Department as a result of the abandonment of the prison service supply and transport market test.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. John McAllion, dated 4 May 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your Question about the costs incurred as a result of the abandonment of the Prison Service supply and transport market test.

In July 1992 approval was given for the award of a contract, subject to negotiation of satisfactory terms and consultation with the TUS, to Beck and Pollitzer for the operation of the warehousing and distribution function of the Prison Service Supply and Transport Branch. The operative date of the contract was to be 1 April 1993.

At the time of this decision, it was anticipated that all staff working in the function would be made redundant, although some might be re-employed by Beck and Pollitzer. The estimated redundancy payments for all the staff were £875,000.

As it was not possible to negotiate a satisfactory contract with Beck and Pollitzer, a 3-year service level agreement was awarded to the next best bid, the in-house bid. Staff, who had received redundancy notices in September 1992, were given the option of accepting redundancy or agreeing to the withdrawal of the redundancy notice. Redundancy payments to those who decided to accept redundancy were £620,000.

The Prison Service did not incur any other costs as a result of the abandonment of the market test.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contract was awarded to Beck and Politzer following the abandonment of the prison service supply and transport market test; whether it was a result of a competitive tendering exercise; and whether an in-house bid was permitted.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. John McAllion, dated 4 May 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the contract awarded to Beck and Politzer.

Following the decision to award a 3-year service level agreement for the in-house management of the Prison Service Supply and Transport warehousing and distribution function, a 1-year consultancy contract was agreed with Beck and Politzer to provide the in-house management team with advice and assistance in achieving operational and administrative improvements to the function.

A great deal of preparatory work was carried out by Beck and Politzer in the seven months from the original decision to award them the contract for the management of the function up to the decision to retain the work in-house and this latter decision was made only 4 weeks before the operative date of 1 April 1993. There was therefore not time to arrange for competitive tendering, nor would it have been practical for either another contractor or an in-house team to act as consultants, as the new computer systems to be used after 1 April for stock control and distribution planning were based on the original Beck and Politzer proposal. They were therefore the only organisation capable of providing the necessary consultancy advice.

The agreement reached with Beck and Politzer is an example of the private sector working closely with the public sector to enhance services quality and provide value for money.

Prison Transport

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requirements are laid down on how meals are to be provided by Group 4 to prisoners being held in court and police cells while awaiting or during trial; and if these will be hot meals.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of Mr. Lewis, the Director General, the Home Secretary has asked me to write to you directly in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what requirements are laid down on how meals are to be provided by Group 4 to prisoners being held in court and police cells whilst awaiting or during trial; and if these will be hot meals.

The contract with Group 4 Court Services Limited requires the contractor to feed all prisoners who are in its custody at any time between the hours of 1100 and 1400. The lunchtime meal need not be regarded as the main meal of the day, but should be such as to sustain the prisoner until he or she is escorted to the prison or otherwise dealt with. Fresh drinking water should be available to prisoners on request throughout the day. This is in line with guidance to Governors in respect of prisoners held at courts staffed by the Prison Service. Breakfast and tea meals will ordinarily be given either by the police or Prison Service as appropriate.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost currently paid by the prison service for each new cellular van to be constructed.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the temporary absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your Question about the cost paid by the Prison Service for new cellular vans.

The last cellular van purchased by the Prison Service was in July 1991, for a 14-cell van with air-conditioning, at a total cost of £50,667 exclusive of VAT. The last 12-cell van was purchased in September 1990 at a total cost of £47,275 exclusive of VAT. Air-conditioning was fitted to this van in July 1991 at an additional cost of £7,173 exclusive of VAT.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the location, date, list of injuries and cost of repairs incurred in road accidents in 1990, 1991 and 1992 involving (a) cellular vans and (b) other means of transporting prisoners (i) in England and Wales and (ii) in the east midlands and Humberside area.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the transport of prisoners.

Only a relatively small number of prisoner movements are by cellular vehicle. In fact the use of cellular vehicles by the Prison Service only began in 1990 and so far only 26 are in use. Apart from those prisoners conveyed by Group 4 most prisoners are escorted to magistrates' courts and the Crown Court, and between establishments, by Prison Service staff but using contract hire taxis and coaches. Movements from magistrates' courts to prisons are undertaken by the police using their vehicles. (In some areas, eg in London, the police also convey prisoners to magistrates' courts, but are paid for this service by the Prison Service.) We do not therefore have the information with which to answer your question.

We do however have information on the amount spent on repairs, and in settlement of third party claims, in respect of accidents involving Prison Service cellular vehicles. The only years for which the information is complete are 1990 (when these vehicles first began to be used by the Prison Service) and 1991. The information is as follows:

	All areas £	East Midlands and Humberside £
1990	264	nil
1991	2,354·50	618

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoner custody officers are employed by Group 4 Court Escort Services Ltd.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to write to you directly in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the number of prisoner custody officers employed by Group 4 Court Escort Services Ltd.

Group 4 currently have 288 staff employed to undertake prisoner custody officer duties as part of the court escort service in the East Midlands and Humberside.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the running costs incurred during 1992 for transporting prisoners in the east midlands and Humberside area; and if he will give a breakdown of the costs.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of Mr. Lewis, the Director General, the Home Secretary has asked me to write to you directly in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the running costs incurred during 1992 for transporting prisoners in the East Midlands and Humberside area.

Our estimate of the operational staff costs in 1993-94 prices is £9·0 million. This excludes overheads, vehicle costs, catering and medical support. Neither the Prison Service nor the police can readily identify these additional costs. By contrast the total cost under the contract is £8·1 million (excluding VAT, which is reclaimable). This sum contains the cost of administrative and management back-up, together with costs of catering, medical support, accommodation (headquarters, control centre and vehicle bases), vehicles and IT. Of the £9·0 million, £6·0 million is attributable to police costs, and £2·8 million to Prison Service costs.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoner transport movements were made in the east midlands and Humberside area during 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the temporary absence of Mr. Lewis, the Director General from the office, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the number of prisoner transport movements made in the East Midlands and Humberside area during 1992.

Data on prisoner movements is not collected centrally. Survey work conducted last summer indicated an annual rate in the area of about 50,000 prisoner movements from police stations and prisons to courts. More detailed data for 1993 will become available in due course from the contractor's management information system.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the number and types of vehicles Group 4 has in its fleet for transporting prisoners under the private escort service in the east midlands and Humberside.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to write to you directly in reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about Group 4's fleet of vehicles for the court escort service in the East Midlands and Humberside.

Group 4 are using 70 vehicles, of which 57 are cellular vehicles, three are personnel carriers and 10 saloon cars.

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost in (a) money and (b) man hours of retaking prisoners who escape while in the charge of Group 4 personnel.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Mr. David Young, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the cost and man hours involved in the re-taking of prisoners who have escaped from the custody of Group 4 personnel.

The nature and circumstances of incidents of escapes differ widely from one case to the next and the Prison Service is not charged for costs incurred in recapturing prisoners. The information requested is not, therefore, available.

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the contract with Group 4 to provide prisoner escort services contains penalty clauses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Mr. David Young, dated 4 May 1993:

In the absence of Mr. Lewis, the Director General, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about penalty clauses in the contract with Group 4 Court Services Ltd. for the provision of the court escort service in the East Midlands and Humberside.

The contract with Group 4 contains mechanisms which allow adjustments to payments to be made in the event of circumstances occurring which fall outside the terms of the contract. Where a material failure is caused by circumstances within the contractor's control and is not corrected within 20 days of it being brought to his attention, the Prison Service may terminate the contract.

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is his policy to allow male and female prisoners to travel in the same vehicle while being escorted to court; and if he will call for an investigation into an incident on Tuesday 20 April when a female prisoner was put with male prisoners in a vehicle operated by Group 4 Court Escort Services Ltd. with no female custody officer present.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 5 May 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply directly to your recent Parliamentary question about male and female prisoners being escorted in the same vehicle.

The Prison Service has no objection in principle to escorting male and female prisoners to court together as long as the escort is properly staffed and supervised. The contract with Group 4 requires the separation of male and female prisoners, but the Prison Service is content that such separation be achieved by placing prisoners in separate compartments of a cellular vehicle. Where it is judged in the prisoner's interest to be escorted rather than to await the arrival of a female PCO, a female prisoner may be escorted by male PCOs. The contract with Group 4 states that the general presumption will be that a female officer will accompany a female prisoner, and that escorts of females by male Prisoner Custody Officers will be very much the exception.

Prison Regime (Code of Standards)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he is making with the establishment of a code of standards for the prison regime; when he expects the code to be ready for issue; what account he has taken of previous recommendations on the subject; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from I. Dunbar to Mr. Harry Greenway, dated May 1993:

In the temporary absence of the Director General, Mr. Lewis, the Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about progress on establishing a code of standards for the Prison Service.

Following two public consultation seminars last year on the aims of a code of standards, drafting of the code is now well underway in the Prison Service. Standards are being drafted to reflect the Prison Service's responsibilities towards both the public and prisoners, and will take account of the views expressed in the Woolf Report, the Government White Paper "Custody, Care and Justice", and comments received during consultation.

The code will be published in December 1993.

Prison Education Service

Mr. Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many redundancies he expects as a result of the tendering out of the prison education service.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The staff who provide education services in prison establishments are not employed by the prison service. Decisions on redundancy are a matter for the employer and it is not yet possible to quantify whether and to what extent staff currently employed in delivering education services in prisons may be made redundant following competitive tendering.

Fire Service, Wales

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures are being taken to improve the efficiency and response times of each fire service in Wales.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government are concerned to ensure that all fire authorities in Wales conform to the minimum nationally recommended standards of fire cover, and that they do so as efficiently and economically as possible. The primary responsibility for providing an efficient fire service rests with the fire authority and the chief officer of the fire brigade. Each brigade in Wales is inspected annually by Her Majesty's inspectorate of fire services to ensure that fire authorities are operating as efficiently as possible and continuing to meet acceptable standards of fire cover.

Neighbourhood Watch

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes exist in each county in Wales for each year since 1987.

Mr. Jack: Information on the number of neighbourhood watch schemes is recorded at police force level and so it is not possible to attribute schemes to individual Welsh counties. The number of schemes recorded by the police at the end of each year in question is given in the following table:

Neighbourhood watch schemes in Wales

Force	Number of neighbourhood watch schemes
	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992
Dyfed-Powys	108	514	719	807	940	1,102

Victim Support

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Government's policy for funding and supporting Victim Support.

Mr. Jack: The Government attach importance to the work of Victim Support in providing both practical help and advice and emotional support to victims of crime. There are currently about 380 branches and schemes with some 8,000 volunteer visitors covering 98 per cent. of the population of England and Wales. They handle about 800,000 cases a year.

Home Office grant to the national charity Victim Support will amount to £8·4 million this year. This is an increase of 15 per cent. over last year's provision, which itself represented a 28 per cent. increase over the previous year's.

Police Forces

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out, for each police authority in England, for the most recent year for which figures are available, (a) the number of police officers, (b) the number of civilian staff, (c) the population in the area covered and (d) the ratio of officers and staff to population; and what were the comparable figures for 1978-79.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is as follows:

Racial Attacks

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many reports have been recorded by the police of racial abuse or racial attacks in south-east London in each year since 1987.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The number of racial incidents recorded for 3 Area of the Metropolitan police, which consists of the London boroughs of Southwark, Lewisham, Bromley, Greenwich and Bexley, is as follows:

Year	Number
1987	244
1988	292
1989	396
1990	394
1991	596
1992	811

Public Order Act

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will propose amendment of the Public Order Act 1986.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. and learned Friend gave to a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on 31 March at column 225.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had from the Association of Chief Police Officers concerning the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Department has received one letter from the Association of Chief Police Officers concerning the operation of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost of consulting canine experts to determine whether or not dogs at the centre of the Mold Hendre Woods trial are pit bulls.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The cost to the prosecuting authorities of obtaining advice as to the identification of the 29 dogs involved in this case is £2,514·50.

Identity Cards

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a national identity card for all United Kingdom citizens; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Although I remain ready to consider any arguments which may be advanced in favour of introducing an identity card system, I am not at present persuaded that the case for such a system has been made.

Child Abuse

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he is making to the recommendations in the NSPCC report into "Joint Enterprise and Parents", relating to (a) seeking separate trials in such cases, (b) reviewing the guidelines on what constitutes neglect or cruelty for the purposes of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933, (c) making admissible evidence of behaviour of one parent against a child and (d) clarifying the extent to which a trial judge may comment on a defendant's choice not to give evidence.

Mr. Jack: The principal recipient of the NSPCC report into "Joint Enterprise and Parents" was the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice, which is expected to report in the summer. The Government will very carefully consider any proposals the commission may make that have a bearing on the issues raised in this question. A copy of the report was also sent by the director of the NSPCC to my right hon. and learned Friend, who in his reply offered the view that the report provided a useful analysis of actual cases while clearly demonstrating that there were no easy answers to the problems identified.

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 16 March, Official Report, column 169, on corporal punishment, if he will list the evidence referred to in his answer.

Mr. Jack: The evidence referred to in that answer is the same evidence which informed policy in 1948.

Boards of Visitors

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has to report on Lord Justice Woolf's recommendations concerning a president of boards of visitors.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have been considering the report of a working group which was established to look at this recommendation, together with the representations that have been made to me by interested parties.

I have decided against appointing a president of boards of visitors. There is no strong consensus of opinion amongst boards in favour of a president and some concern from them that their local, autonomous and voluntary nature might be compromised by such an appointment. Lord Woolf suggested that a president migh develop more effective methods for recruiting new members to boards and give guidance on good practice to be followed by boards, including the provision of training. These areas are already being addressed by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in conjunction with the board of visitors representative bodies and the prison service liaison section for boards of visitors.

Consequently, I am not convinced that the appointment of a president is required.

Boards of visitors have served the Crown and the public for many years and as Lord Woolf pointed out, we have good cause to be grateful to them for the work they do. The many changes that are happening now within the prison service have resulted in boards of visitors being faced with increasing demands upon their time. With this in mind, I have asked that once the prison service agency has had time to adjust to its own new status, consideration should be given to Lord Woolf's other recommendations and conclusions regarding boards of visitors to see whether we can assist boards further in carrying out their important role.

Directorate of Telecommunications

Sir John Wheeler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for privatising the directorate of telecommunications.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: As I announced on 3 February 1993 at column 204, I have been given approval for advisers to be engaged in preparation for the privatisation of DTELS (formerly the Directorate of Telecommunications). The aim is privatise during 1993-94 by means of a trade sale.

Expenses in connection with the sale will be met from sale receipts. Parliamentary approval of this new service will be sought in a Supplementary Estimate for the Home Office's privatisation of DTELS vote (class VIII, vote 5). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure incurred in advance of the sale will be met by repayable advances, not expected to exceed £1 million, from the Contingencies Fund.

Racism and Homophobia

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that all police forces monitor racial and homophobic attacks.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 4 May 1993]: All police forces monitor racial incidents reported to them, and report to HM inspectorate of constabulary each year the number of incidents.

The introduction of systematic monitoring of homophobic attacks is a matter for chief officers.

Life Imprisonment

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time that a prisoner sentenced to life imprisonment spends in prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The available information is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (table 8.5 of the latest volume, for 1991, Cm 2157), copies of which are in the Library. There are wide variations in time served, as shown by table 8.3 of the same publication.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Market Testing

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to introduce new legislation to ease the implementation of further market testing programmes for central Government Departments and agencies in 1993-94.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's legislative programme for 1993-94 will be announced in the Queen's Speech.

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what estimate he has made of the percentage savings arising from market testing in previous years; and if he will give details of evidence he has for the level of savings.

Mr. Waldegrave: Annual returns from Departments indicate that in previous years savings arising from market testing have typically been around 25 per cent. of the original cost even when the activity has remained in-house.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what safeguards exist, under the market testing programme, to prevent contractors or consultants already engaged by a Department from bidding for new work to which they had access or privileged information as a result of their involvement in an earlier contract.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is the responsibility of each Department to assure itself that proper safeguards are in place to preserve fair and open competition and any competitive tendering exercise. Guidance on these matters was set out most recently by Her Majesty's Treasury's public competition and purchasing unit in its guidance note No. 40, "The Competitive Tendering Process", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if it is Government policy for external contractors to be market tested against an in-house bid at the re-tendering stage following a market test in which the initial contract was awarded to an external contractor.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is the Government's general policy not to allow in-house bids when contracted out services are re-tendered. But there may be circumstances when such a bid would be allowed, for example when it could be made as part of a larger in-house bid, in a market test also covering services currently done in-house, or when there appeared to be insufficient external competition.

HEALTH

Sellafield (Emissions)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimates her Department have made of the number of people who will die each year (a) in Cumbria, (b) in the United Kingdom and (c) worldwide, as a result of the proposed emissions of krypton gas from Nuclear Fuels Ltd.'s thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield in Cumbria;

(2) what assessment has been made of the additional cost to the health service of treating the additional childhood leukaemias and other cancers due to the emissions of radioactivity from the Sellafield site compared with current, actual emissions.

Mr. Sackville: The estimated collective dose for members of the pubic in the United Kingdom, Europe and worldwide from the proposed emissions of radionuclides, including Krypton 85, from British Nuclear Fuel Ltd's thermal oxide reprocessing plant are tabulated in the authorising Departments' explanatory memorandum to the draft authorisations. Copies of the draft authorisations are available in the Library. Estimates of the theoretical number of fatal cancers can be made using the fatal cancer risk factor recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection, which is currently 0·05 deaths per Sievert. For example, this theoretical calculation would imply, for all radionuclides discharged annually to the atmosphere from these proposed authorisations (covering all plants on the Sellafield site), rather less than one excess death in the United Kingdom over the next few decades. This precludes any sensible quantification of cost.

Tuberculosis

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) cases of and (b) deaths from tuberculosis were recorded in each district health authority area in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The number of cases of tuberculosis recorded in each district health authority is not available centrally. The numbers of deaths from tuberculosis will be placed in the Library.

Transitional Grants

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the basis for adjustments, and transfer of funds where appropriate, to transitional grant where boundary changes take place.

Mr. Yeo: We will consider the effects of any significant changes in future years when calculating the distribution of the special transitional grant for those years.

Personal Social Services

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list in rank order the top five providers measured in terms of home help hours per year for those aged over 75 years among social services authorities; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: This information is not available centrally. Figures on hours of home help received by clients of all ages are collected by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy and an indicator relating this information to the resident population aged 75 and over by local authority is included in the Personal and Social Services Key Indicators. A copy of the latest publication, for 1990-91, is available in the Library.

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the impact of the annual financial settlement on the level of spending on personal social services in 1993-94.

Mr. Yeo: Total standard spending for local authority personal social services in 1993-94 is £5,585 million, an increase of 15 per cent. over 1992-93. With effective use of these resources, now almost 35 per cent. in real terms above the 1990-91 level, authorities should be able to make progress expanding existing services and fully discharge their new responsibilities for community care.

Magnetic Resonance Imaging

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the level of provision of magnetic resonance imaging scanners.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) on 28 April at col. 447. The latest figures held by the Department indicate that there are 78 magnetic resonance imaging scanners in England.

Patients Charter

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of district health authorities met the patients charter targets for (a) assessments following admission to accident and emergency units and (b) waiting times in out-patient clinics in the first six months of the financial year.

Mr. Sackville: District health authorities, as purchasers of health care, will shortly be publishing their first annual report on performance against all patients charter standards achieved by their providers.

A commentary on overall performance will be included in the chief executive's annual report for 1992-93.

Prescription Charges

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of dispensed drugs are liable to full prescription charges; what proportion are free; and what proportion of the population are liable to pay prescription charges.

Dr. Mawhinney: In 1992, a prescription charge was paid on around 15 per cent. of items dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, a further 5 per cent. were covered by prescription prepayment certificates and about 80 per cent. were dispensed free. An estimated 50 per cent. of the population are liable to pay prescription charges.

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she is taking to monitor the impact of increased prescription charges.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information we regularly collect does not indicate that the level of prescription charge influences patient access to necessary medication. The number of prescribed items dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors rose from 305 million in 1979 to 387 million in 1992, and is expected to exceed 403 million in 1993-94.

Dentistry

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether a rolling capitation system of dental remuneration for treating non-exempt adults is to be introduced;

(2) what will be the role of family health service authorities in the provision of general dental services following consideration of the Bloomfield report on dental remuneration;

(3) what new arrangements for dentistry in the general dental service will be put in place after consideration of the Bloomfield report on dental remuneration;

(4) if she will make it her policy that (a) the doctors and dentists pay review should continue to exist under any new service arrangements for dentistry following consideration of the Bloomfield report on dental remuneration and (b) the current expenditure on dental services should remain at its present level;

(5) if she will (a) ring fence family health services authority funds for general dental services and (b) uprate funds in addition to inflation factors.

Dr. Mawhinney: Consultation on the Bloomfield report is continuing. We will announce our proposals in due course.

Community Care

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she last met representatives of (a) the Association of Directors of Social Services, (b) the British Association of Social Workers, (c) organisations representing those with learning disabilities, (d) carers, (e) service users, (f) the Social Care Association and (g) organisations providing residential, drug and alcohol projects to discuss the implementation of the changes in community care and the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I most recently met the Association of Directors of Social Services on 26 April 1993.

I met representatives of the British Association of Social Workers on 11 November 1992.

I met the national development team on 7 May 1992, Rescare on 14 May 1992, ARC on 7 July 1992 and Mencap on 27 July 1992.

Ministers have attended a number of functions arranged by carer organisations in recent months. I met the Relatives Association on 11 March 1993.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had several meetings with Age Concern, the most recent of which was on 8 February 1993. I met the National Schizophrenia Fellowship on 10 February 1993. I met the all-party disablement group on 3 November 1992. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the all-party parliamentary group for pensioners on 15 December 1992. We are setting up a group of users and carers who will give Ministers feedback on their experiences of the implementation of the community care reforms.

The Social Care Association has not sought meetings to discuss the implementation of community care.

At the end of last year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I met a large number of independent sector drug and alcohol service providers to discuss various issues surrounding the implementation of community care.

Ambulances

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made in improving ambulance response times; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 23 March at col. 576.

Nurses

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the level of job opportunities available to newly qualified nurses.

Mr. Sackville: The level of job opportunities available to newly qualified nurses will be for regional health authorities and local employers to decide. Where possible, regional health authorities and local employers are taking a variety of approaches to manage the situation, including expansion of flexible working patterns, job sharing, short-term contracts and clearing house schemes which alert newly qualified nurses to suitable posts.

Hepatitis B

Mr. Boyce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on hepatitis B vaccination.

Mr. Sackville: In the United Kingdom hepatitis B vaccine is recommended for those at particular risk as a result of occupation, lifestyle or other factors such as intimate contact with a person infected with hepatitis B or a carrier of the disease. High risk groups include:

intravenous drug abusers;
those with multiple sexual partners;
close family contacts of an infected person or carrier;
babies born to mothers who are chronic carriers or who have had acute hepatitis B during pregnancy; certain occupational groups, including all health care workers involved in invasive procedures.

The policy is kept under constant review, with expert advice from the Advisory Group on Hepatitis and the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation.

"The Health of the Nation"

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on progress towards "The Health of the Nation" targets.

Mr. Sackville: "The Health of the Nation" is a long-term strategy, with many of its targets for the year 2000 and beyond. The mechanisms are in place to meet the targets. All national health service regions have implementation plans and a wide range of other bodies are now actively working together to bring about improvements in health.

Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the regulations to be made under section 30 of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 will be laid.

Mr. Sackville: We have today issued a consultation document which includes draft regulations to be known as the Parental Orders for Gamete Donors Regulations 1993. The period for public consultation will end on 2 July 1993. The Government intend to lay the draft regulations before Parliament as soon as possible after the results of the consultation exercise have been considered. Copies of the consultation document are available in the Library.

Tranquilliser Addiction

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is issued by her Department to general practitioners concerning the treatment of patients with tranquilliser addiction.

Dr. Mawhinney: Detailed advice on the prescribing of benzodiazepines issued by the Committee on the Safety of Medicines is given in the British National Formulary which is issued free to all doctors. This advice contains a withdrawal protocol for general practitioners to help patients reduce their dependency gradually.

NHS Administration

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the numbers of employees in (a) administrative grades and (b) medical staff employed in the national health service for each of the past seven years, and currently.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information available is shown in the table.

Whole-time equivalent administrative and medical staff in England for 30 September of each year

Year	Administrative and clerical	Medical
1985	110,940	38,900
1986	110,840	39,270
1987	113,900	39,060
1988	114,720	40,390
1989	116,840	41,680
1990	120,040	42,990
1991	127,370	44,210

Department of Health form KM 49 (1991 figures).

Notes:
1. The figures represent staff directly appointed in the Hospital and Community Health Service. Those for administrative grades are the staff employed on the terms and conditions of the NHS Administrative and Clerical Staffs Whitley Council. Medical staff include those in both career grades and training grades in the Hospital and Community Health Service.
2. The figures for 1991 include staff in NHS trusts.
3. The figures for 1992 are not yet available.

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of remuneration paid to chairmen and members of regional and district health authorities and trusts; and what has been the level of remuneration in each case of the past five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The current levels payable since 1 December 1991, of annual remuneration for chairmen and non-executives of NHS authorities and trusts are:

RHA Chairmen: £20,925.

DHA Chairmen are paid according to a banding structure based on the district revenue budget. The present rates are:

Revenue budget 1985-86	Band	Rates per annum (£)
In excess of £60 million	Band 1	19,285
Between £30 million to £60 million	Band 2	17,145
Less than £30 million	Band 3	15,125

FHSA chairmen are also paid according to a banding structure based on the population of the area covered by the authority. The present rates are:

FHSA population mid 1985	Band	Rates per annum £
Over 750,000	Band 1	12,605
250,000-750,000	Band 2	11,720
Under 250,000	Band 3	10,845

NHS trust chairmen are paid according to the unit turnover in 1988-89. The present rates are:

Unit turnover 1988-89	Band	Rates per annum £
In excess of £50 million	Band 1	19,285
Between £20 million and £50 million	Band 2	17,145
Less than £20 million	Band 3	15,125

Remuneration for non-executive members and directors of NHS authorities and trusts was introduced in 1990. All receive £5,000 per annum.

The remuneration of NHS authority and trust chairmen since July 1987 was:

Date	RHAs £	DHAs £	Trusts £
1 July 1991	19,110	13,812-17,610	13,812-17,610
1 July 1990	18,921	13,674-17,437	—
1 July 1989	12,462	12,462	—
1 July 1988	11,709	11,709	—
1 July 1987	11,205	11,205	—

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will indicate the criteria used in appointing members of health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: Members of health authorities are appointed for their personal qualities and skills, and for the contribution they can make to the authority. The aim is to achieve a balance on the authority of different skills and experience, including local knowledge.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of self-deferrals by people who had been waiting (a) 0-11 months, (b) 12-23 months or (c) 24 or more months for (i) in-patient and for (ii) day case treatment in each six months period since April 1987.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 23 April 1993]: Such information as is available is given in the table. Information about self-deferred cases is available only from September 1987. The increase in self-deferrals for day case treatment reflects the 128 per cent. increase in day case admissions over the same period.

Self-deferred cases
Numbers at end of six-month periods ending:

	In-patients	Day case
September 1987	40,766	8,977
March 1988	39,115	8,361
September 1988	40,753	8,433
March 1989	37,098	8,769
September 1989	38,224	9,905
March 1990	36,441	9,735
September 1990	39,274	11,865
March 1991	36,115	11,998
September 1991	33,868	12,469
March 1992	30,965	13,151
September 1992	35,992	18,134

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients waiting more than two years for treatment were removed from waiting lists (a) by admission for treatment and (b) for reasons other than treatment; and how many were self-deferred, in each regional health authority in each six-month period since September 1988.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 23 April 1993]: The information available centrally on the total numbers of patients who were either admitted or removed from waiting lists or self-deferred has been placed in the Library. Information on the numbers of these patients who had waited over two years is not held centrally.

PRIME MINISTER

Treaties

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many treaties have been ratified by Her Majesty's Government since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Her Majesty's Government have ratified 243 treaties since 1 January 1979.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received from the City of London about the proposal to close the accident and emergency department at St. Bartholomew's hospital.

The Prime Minister: So far as I am aware, none.

Orders in Council

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the statutory powers which have authorised the use of the Orders in Council in the last six months.

The Prime Minister: Since 1 November 1992, Orders in council have been made under the following Acts and Measures:

Burial Acts 1853 and 1855
Child Abduction and Custody Act 1985
Civil Aviation Acts 1949 and 1982
Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments Act 1982
Continental Shelf Act 1964
Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988
Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990
Dioceses Measure 1978
Education Reform Act 1988
Education (Scotland) Act 1980
European Communities Act 1972
Extradition Acts 1870 and 1989
Foreign Compensation Acts 1950 and 1969
Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988
Judicature (Northern Ireland) Act 1978
Local Government Act 1972 and 1974

Maintenance Orders (Reciprocal Enforcement) Act 1972
Merchant Shipping Act 1894
Naval and Marine Pay and Pensions Act 1865
Northern Ireland Act 1974
Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973
Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986
Pastoral Measure 1983
Royal Marriages Act 1772
Social Security Administration Act 1992
Social Security (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1977
Supreme Court Act 1981
Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1992
United Nations Act 1964
University of London Act 1978
Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act 1923
Universities (Scotland) Act 1966

Public Servants

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many persons have been appointed to grades 1 to 7, or equivalent grades, in the civil service since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Since 1979 there has been about 1,250 grade 1 to 3 appointments in the home civil service. This figure includes those appointed from within the service.

About 4,000 recruits have entered the home civil service at grade levels 4 to 7 during the period. This figure excludes promotions from within the civil service, on which information is not readily available.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Ecclesiastical Buildings

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the peculiars enjoying the ecclesiastical exemption from listed building control.

Mr. Brooke: This information is not available. My Department will shortly be discussing the status of peculiars with church representatives, in the light of the changes to the scope of the ecclesiastical exemption which I announced on 17 December at columns 370-71.

BSkyB

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what response he has made to the Independent Producers Association and to the all-party media committee in respect of their submissions concerning the regulatory framework for BSkyB.

Mr. Brooke: The chairman of the all-party media group has recently written to me and I shall be responding shortly. I have not yet received a submission from the Independent Producers Association.

Bernard Shaw Estate

Mr. Fisher: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps have been taken to ensure that the British museum has used the proceeds of the Bernard Shaw estate to fulfil the ends expressed in Mr. Shaw's will.

Mr. Key: The use of income from the bequest is entirely a matter for the trustees of the British Museum.

Deaf and Blind Sports

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what level of direct financial support will be available to the British Deaf Sports Council and British Blind Sport in the coming financial year;

(2) if he will make a statement on Government aid for profoundly deaf people in sport;

(3) what action he will take to assist the British Deaf Sports Council with administrative costs associated with costs arising from participation in the world games for the deaf in Sofia, Bulgaria;

(4) what steps he will take to improve awareness of deaf persons' needs in sport.

Mr. Brooke: In 1993-94, the British Deaf Sports Council and British Blind Sport will each receive a grant of £30,000 from the Sports Council, channelled through the British Sports Association for the Disabled. The Sports Council also assists the British Paralympic Association (BPA) which has agreed to provide £70,000 towards the costs of the World Games for the Deaf and hopes to contribute more. My Department will be represented in Sofia and I am sure that the achievements of our deaf athletes will increase public awareness of this aspect of disabled sport.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Security

Mr. George: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what plans there are to reduce the cost of security at the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Beith: None. All services provided in the Palace are monitored to ensure that best value for money is obtained.

Silverware

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will list the occasions in each of the last five years when cutlery has been sold; what were the scrap weights and the estimated number of items in each consignment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: I understand from the Director of Catering Services that the Refreshment Department records show that cutlery and holloware has been sold on three occasions, detailed as follows:

Date	Scrap weight cwt.	Approximate number of items	Scrap value per cwt. £	Credit received £
3 May 1991	6·82	2,000	16·00	109
12 February 1992	4·25	500	17·50	74
1 April 1993	1·37	75	25·50	35

The Department's records indicate that damaged and worn out cutlery and holloware were not sold back to its supplier until May 1991. Prior to that time, they were written off by stock-takers, agreed by the National Audit Office as "unusable" and accumulated in the Refreshment Department stores. This accumulated stock was sold in the two lots noted above, dated May 1991 and February 1992, hence the large number of items disposed of in these transactions. At the financial year-end stock-take in March 1993, approximately 75 items were written off as a result of wear and tear and were sold for scrap in the transaction above dated April 1993.

There is no evidence of any substantial theft of cutlery or holloware from the House.

The Department's conditions of trade now specify that no cutlery or holloware will be disposed of by its supplier unless all identifiable crests and marks have been erased.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will publish the letter from the Director of Catering Services to the hon. Member for Bradford, South dated 27 April, relating to House of Commons silverware.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: The terms of the letter are as follows:

"Further to your question tabled for reply on 26 April, I am pleased to write with the details you requested.

The cutlery to which I believe you refer was damaged as a result of normal wear and tear and was disposed of by sale as scrap to the Department's nominated silverware supplier. In fact two small consignments of redundant silverware have been disposed of in this manner in the past six months. The total scrap value paid to the Department was £109, based on the weight of the redundant silverware.

In November 1992, it was brought to our attention by The Sunday Times that House of Commons silverware was being offered for sale in the USA. It transpired that a consignment of redundant silverware sold back to our supplier in the normal way had been sold on by them for melting down by a third party without having first erased all Portcullis badging. The silverware was then sold on by the third party and eventually appeared for sale on the open market in the USA. Rest assured, contractual agreement has since been formalised that no old silverware will be disposed of by our supplier unless all identifiable crests and marks have been erased.

I trust this information is helpful to you, please do not hesitate to contact me if you have any points you would like to raise on the matter."

I understand from the Director of Catering Services that there was an error in the letter. The two consignments of silverware mentioned in the second paragraph of the letter were in fact disposed of in February 1992 and April 1993.

Committee Stages

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list each Bill, since 1979, whose Committee stage exceeded the hours spent overall on the Committee stage of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill in Session 1992-93; and in respect of which of those Bills the House made allocation of time orders.

Mr. Newton: Since Session 1979-80, no Bill which was committed to a Committee of the whole House has had a Committee stage as long as that of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill. Comparative figures for Bills committed to Standing Committees are only available at disproportionate cost.

EDUCATION

Ministerial Visits to Schools

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many of the schools (a) he and (b) the three schools Ministers have visited in the past year are (i) grant maintained, (ii) local authority run and (iii) private.

Mr. Forth: Of the 117 schools visited by the DFE ministerial team my right hon. Friend has visited three grant-maintained schools, 25 local authority maintained schools, two non-maintained special schools, five independent schools and two city technology colleges.

I, my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) have between us visited 13 grant-maintained schools, 55 local authority maintained schools, one non-maintained special school, seven independent schools and four city technology colleges.

Postgraduate Students

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to assist postgraduate students to fund their course fees and living expenses where their education authority are refusing to grant discretionary awards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: Local education authorities have power to make discretionary awards to students on postgraduate courses, other than those designated under the Postgraduate etc. Courses (Exclusion from Discretionary Awards) Regulations as being within the ambit of another postgraduate award-making body. Universities can use their access funds to help full-time postgraduate students facing financial difficulties. My right hon. Friend has no plans to establish a new award scheme for postgraduates unable to secure support from other sources.

Advertisements

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the newspapers and other journals in which he placed advertisements on 27 April; and what was the cost to his Department in each case.

Mr. Forth: Advertisements were placed in The Independent and The Guardian. The rates for placing advertisements are negotiated on an individual basis and this information is commercial in confidence.

Tests

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) if he will list the local education authorities which in the seven years before the introduction of assessment and testing within the national curriculum failed to ensure that children in their schools were assessed and tested until they took examinations at 16-plus;

(2) if he will list the schools in each local education authority area, which in the seven years before the introduction of assessment and testing within the national curriculum failed to ensure that children were assessed and tested until they took public examinations at 16-plus;

(3) if he will list the action taken by his predecessors and himself since 1979 to remedy the failures reported to them as far as the non-testing of children before the age of 16-plus was concerned.

Mr. Forth: Comprehensive information on testing and assessment policies in individual local education authorities and individual schools is not available in the form requested. There have been a number of surveys of tests used for different age groups, however. The most recent was conducted by the National Foundation for Educational Research on behalf of the School Examinations and Assessment Council (SEAC) in March 1992 on existing practices in local education authorities for testing 11-year-olds. No testing took place in 49 out of the 91 authorities which responded—over half.

The same theme is to be found in a number of reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate. For example, in OFSTED's most recent report, "Assessment, Recording and Reporting in 1991-92", the schools inspectors said that they had found that "The quality of teacher assessment during key stage 3 remained variable with the norm being weak"

"the quality of teacher assessment in middle schools was rarely good."

The main action to remedy this was taken by my right hon. Friend and his predecessors when the national curriculum and its associated assessment arrangements were introduced in the Education Reform Act 1988, to ensure that all pupils were rigorously assessed in the national curriculum subjects four times during 11 years of compulsory schooling, on completion of programmes of study associated with each key stage—for most pupils at the ages of 7, 11, 14 and 16. Implementation of statutory assessment procedures began with tests for seven-year-olds in 1991. Tests for 11-year-olds will be the last to be introduced, in 1994.

Special Needs

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what progress has been made to reduce the time taken by local education authorities in issuing statements of special needs; and which local education authorities have met his Department's recommended time of issuing special needs statements.

Mr. Forth: The information requested has not to date been collected centrally. However the Government recognise that there has been concern over the time some LEAs can take to complete their statutory duties in this area. The Education Bill, now in the other place, accordingly empowers the Secretary of State to make regulations prescribing time limits for the making of assessments and statements, subject to prescribed exceptions.

Parents' Guide

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will name the advertising agency handling the campaign to publicise the parents' guide, "How is Your Child doing at School?" and what is the fee for this account.

Mr. Forth: The advertising agency is GGK London Ltd. Information about the agency's handling fee is commercial in confidence.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the estimated cost of the free phone line set up for parents to request copies of "How is Your Child Doing at School?".

Mr. Forth: The cost of setting up the free phone line is estimated at £3,500. The cost of operating the line will depend on the response rate.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he placed the order for the parent's guide "How is Your Child Doing at School?"; and how many copies of the leaflet have been published in each of the 10 languages listed in the advertisement published on 27 April.

Mr. Forth: Proposals for a campaign to provide parents with information about testing, based on similar campaigns undertaken in the previous two years, formed part of the Department's publicity strategy approved by the Secretary of State in December last year. The number of copies being produced in each language is:

	Number
English	3,000,000
Hindi	10,000
Bengali	10,000
Punjabi	10,000
Gujerati	10,000
Chinese	10,000
Greek	10,000
Turkish	10,000
Urdu	12,000
Vietnamese	7,500

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much it cost his Department to publish the parent's guide "How is Your Child Doing at School?" in each of the 10 languages listed in the advertisement published on 27 April.

Mr. Forth: The cost of producing the guide in Hindi, Urdu, Bengali, Punjabi, Gujerati, Chinese, Greek, Turkish and Vietnamese is estimated at £18,000 in total. It is not possible to allocate a cost for each individual translation. The cost of producing the version in English is estimated at £132,000.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has for future DOE leaflets for parents.

Mr. Forth: During the current year, my right hon. Friend proposes to issue the following leaflets whose primary target audience is parents:

- a revised version of the parents charter;
- the 1993 comparative tables of schools' performance;
- a leaflet about the assisted places scheme;
- a leaflet, "Questions Parents Ask", about self-governing (GM) schools; and
- a leaflet about GNVQs.

University Students' Grants

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the average annual grant for university students in each European Community country.

Mr. Boswell: The information requested is not held centrally. The table shows the latest available estimates for the expenditure per student on student support and welfare in higher education. A fuller set of comparisons for 1986 is given in the DFE working report "International Comparisons of Higher Education"; copies of which are available in the Library.

[2] Excluding expenditure and students on nursing and paramedic courses at Department of Health establishments. Also excludes in-service teacher training secondments and costs.
[3] Excludes tuition fees.

Dance Students

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what level of financial support is available for students studying dance; and if he will make a statement on the availability of courses in dance and future financial support for dance students.

Mr. Boswell: Students on designated full-time first degree and equivalent level courses in dance are eligible for a mandatory award and a student loan on the terms prescribed in the regulations. Other students may apply to their local education authority for a discretionary award, the availability and amount of which is for the authority to determine. Some dance students also receive support under the Government's music and ballet scheme. The Government keep these arrangements under periodic review.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Kent Marshes

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what role the flood defence function of the National Rivers Authority has in the implementation of higher water levels in the north Kent marshes environmentally sensitive area.

Mr. Curry: Where higher water levels are sought there will be careful liaison between the Ministry and the National Rivers Authority.

Meat Regulations

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about the implementation of EC directives on slaughterhouses (a) in general and (b) in regard to the Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1992 and the requirement for stainless steel hooks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) on 29 April at col. 1136, and to the independent report on hygiene and structural requirements in slaughterhouses which my right hon. Friend the Minister placed in the Library of the House on 31 March (Official Report, 31 March 1993, col. 251).

Pesticides

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of progress in the speeding up of pesticide registration and evaluation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: Good progress is being made by the Pesticides Safety Directorate in speeding up the pesticide evaluation system. Applications for new active ingredients are now being evaluated shortly after receipt of the full data package and the target is to clear 15 such applications in the current year. This is a substantial increase on previous years. Queues have also been eliminated in three other approval streams covering experimental permits and minor changes to existing approvals. The waiting period for applications requiring the evaluation of new data in respect of existing products had been reduced from a peak of 91 weeks to 67 weeks. I expect this period to be reduced significantly over the next few months.

Table Salt

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has plans to ban the use of sodium hexacyanoferrate as an additive in table salt.

Mr. Soames: I have no plans to ban the use of this additive. Sodium hexacyanoferrate is permitted by the Miscellaneous Additives in Food Regulations (as amended). It was last evaluated by the Committee on the Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT) as an anti-caking agent in salt in 1988. The COT confirmed that sodium hexacyanoferrate was provisionally acceptable for use in food pending the submission of further studies. These studies have now been carried out and will be reviewed by the COT when full details have been submitted.

Radioactive Fallout

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many sheep and farms, covering what land area in total, are still affected by the restrictions imposed on farms as a result of the radioactive fallout from the Chernobyl nuclear accident in May 1986.

Mr. Curry: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of farms	Acreage (approx)	Number of sheep (approx)
England	126	90,588	110,500
Northern Ireland	98	18,742	17,750
Scotland	54	137,579	106,000
Wales	353	180,000	248,000

Dairy Herds (Bacteria)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how often the Milk Marketing Board performs a bacteria count and cell count on every dairy herd.

Mr. Curry: The Milk Marketing Board aims to test the milk supplied to it by each producer once a week.

IACS Forms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will extend the deadline for the submission of integrated administration and control system forms for one month from 5 May.

Mr. Curry: No.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about his Department's approach to those who return their IACS forms with (a) minor and (b) major errors.

Mr. Curry: We are carrying out an initial brief check of IACS forms received to ensure that essential details have been provided and the application has been signed. Applications which satisfy this test are accepted as having been lodged with the Department on the date of receipt. Other applications are returned to farmers for completion or signature, and will be lodged on the date we received the completed or signed form. We cannot, however, guarantee to check all applications in time for them to be completed before the deadline, and it is for farmers to ensure that they have supplied all the necessary information. All applications will subsequently be subjected to more detailed checks of the information provided. The penalties to be applied where IACS forms are late or inaccurate are laid down by EC regulations. Details are set out in the IACS explanatory booklet, together with the procedures for the correction of genuine errors. We shall be as reasonable as we possibly can in our checks of applications received, particularly where minor errors are involved, but we have to operate within the legislative framework.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what penalties he is proposing for those who return IACS forms late; what is the return date for IACS forms in every other EC country; and what are the penalties for late submission in every other EC country.

Mr. Curry: The penalties for late claims are laid down in EC regulations, and apply equally in all EC member states. Details are set out in the IACS explanatory booklet.

The EC regulations set a deadline of 15 May for the return of IACS applications this year. I understand that the majority of member states have opted for a deadline on or around 15 May, though Spain set a closing date of 31 March and France a date of 30 April. Portugal has set 30 April for farmers with autumn and winter crops and 15 May for the others. There is provision in the EC regulations for member states to set a deadline between 15 May and 1 July where the application relates only to permanent pasture and it is submitted at the same time as a livestock aid application. I understand that only Ireland has exercised this option.

Dairy Inspectors

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many dairy inspectors there are in the United Kingdom; how often dairy inspectors visit each farm to administer the dairy regulations; what is the cost to the farmer of each visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: There are 21 dairy inspectors in England and Wales. The frequency of inspection visits varies but top quality milk producers whose milk is consistently placed in Band A of the Milk Marketing Board's total bacterial count scheme, who have a good history of compliance with milk and dairy regulations and who demonstrated satisfactory on-farm conditions during the most recent visits, will normally be visited every three and a half years. Other producers are visited more frequently depending on the standards they achieve. The present cost to the farmer of each visit is £92, or £71 if he has fewer than 20 cows. The position in Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for the respective Secretaries of State.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those EC countries operating restrictions on specified offals.

Mr. Soames: According to information collected by the European Commission in April 1991, in addition to the United Kingdom, Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy and the Netherlands have a ban on the feeding of specified bovine offals to ruminants.

The export of the specified bovine offals from the United Kingdom to other member states is prohibited.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those EC countries that have recorded incidences of BSE.

Mr. Soames: In addition to the United Kingdom, the Republic of Ireland and France have confirmed cases of BSE in indigenous cattle, and there has been a single case of BSE in Denmark in a cow which had been imported from the United Kingdom.

Captive Birds

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what decision he has taken in relation to resuming imports of captive birds from Tanzania.

Mr. Soames: The issue of licences for import of captive birds from Tanzania was suspended in March 1991 because of the failure of the authorities there to respond to our request for a veterinary official of my Department to make a visit and discuss with them various animal health and welfare matters, the standard of health certification and the conditions under which future imports of captive birds would take place.

The Tanzanian veterinary authorities agreed to a visit from a senior MAFF veterinarian in July 1991. Following this visit a new protocol for the provision of animal health certification was subsequently drawn up. The main provision of the new protocol is that the director of veterinary services in Tanzania will be responsible for the production and issue of an official veterinary health certificate, which will be required for all birds entering Great Britain, regardless of their final destination.

I have now received assurances from the Tanzanian veterinary authorities that they will observe the new protocol on exports of all birds to Great Britain, regardless of their final destination. Arrangements are also in hand for verification of the certifying veterinarians.

In view of these assurances, I have agreed to the immediate resumption of the issue of licences for imports of captive birds from Tanzania.

We shall be monitoring closely at ports of entry any consignments of birds arriving from Tanzania in the coming months to ensure that the terms of the protocol have been met. The lifting of the moratorium will not affect the requirement for CITES export permits originating in Tanzania for bird species covered by the convention to be checked for validity by the CITES Secretariat in Lausanne before an import permit can be issued by the Department of the Environment.

We remain committed to securing reductions in the level of mortality in imported captive birds, both whilst in transit to this country and while in post-import quarantine. In addition, we will continue to take appropriate measures to ensure that the highest possible standards are complied with by those transporting birds and those responsible for their care after import.

Animal Breeding Techniques

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how he intends to respond to ethical concerns about the use of new animal breeding techniques on farms.

Mr. Gummer: Ethical concerns about the use of new animal breeding techniques in farming are matters which I take very seriously. I have therefore invited Dr. Michael Banner, Dean of Peterhouse college, Cambridge to chair an ad hoc committee to consider the ethical implications of emerging technologies in the breeding of farm animals. The committee's terms of reference are:

> To consider the ethical implications of emerging technologies in the breeding of farm animals; to advise on the adequacy of the existing legal and other safeguards in those areas; and to make recommendations.

I shall discuss the membership and work programme of the committee with Dr. Banner, and will make a further announcement as soon as these issues have been settled. I expect the committee to report in about a year.

Meat Products

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the degree of over-capacity in the United Kingdom meat foods manufacturing sector.

Mr. Curry [holding answer 4 May 1993]: Overall capacity of the food industry is for the market place to decide. My contacts with representatives of this sector suggest that they are continuing to invest and are optimistic about the future.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Radar Speed Cameras

Ms Walley: to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will take steps to ban the sale and advertising of devices to evade radar speed camera technology.

Mr. Leigh: The use and advertising of such devices is already subject to a number of controls.

The use of radar speed trap detectors constitutes an offence under the Wireless Telegraph Act 1949.

Under the Vehicles (Excise) Act 1971 it is an offence to obscure the registration number of a vehicle. It is a common law offence to incite a person to commit an offence, for example, in an advertisement.

The British code of advertising practice, administered by the Advertising Standards Authority requires that advertisements should contain nothing which is in breach of the law.

I understand that the Department of Transport is to strengthen existing regulations to make it illegal to sell reflective number plates of the type designed to evade camera technology.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much money has been loaned by each of the participating banks in the loan guarantee scheme in the prior two years.

Mr. Leigh: Money loaned, by lender, under the small firms loan guarantee scheme in the past two years has been:

£ thousands

Power Stations (Sour Gas)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which power stations in the United Kingdom have been authorised to use sour gas.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has given consent under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 to the following stations which are to be fuelled by "sour gas":

Ryedale, North Yorkshire (50-60 MW)
Connah's Quay, Deeside, North Wales (1,350 MW)

Power stations with a capacity of 50 MW or less are dealt with under the Town and Country Planning Acts and my Department does not have information on such stations.

Consents for power stations in Scotland and Northern Ireland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland respectively.

Trawsfynydd Power Station

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce his decision in respect of Nuclear Electric's application to set up an incinerator to dispose of contaminated oil at Trawsfynydd power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will announce his decision on this application in due course.

Motor Insurance

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the role of his Department in ensuring that only motor insurance companies with current valid authorisation can issue insurance cover; what steps are taken to protect policy holders where there is no valid authorisation; if he will list all recent cases of companies issuing cover without authorisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My Department has responsibilities for administering the Insurance Companies Act 1982. Part of this responsibility is to ensure that only properly authorised companies underwrite motor insurance business in the United Kingdom. When the Department becomes aware of possible illegal underwriting of motor insurance business it will therefore seek to act to have any illegality stopped. Depending on the circumstances of a particular case action by the Department against those who may be in breach of the Act might include investigation, prosecution and seeking a winding up; and if fraud is suspected, referral and/or assistance to the police. Where appropriate, it would also seek to alert the public to the dangers of an illegal operation through appropriate publicity and would liaise with other bodies e.g. the Department of Transport, that may need to be aware of a case or may be able to help with it.

It is the responsibility of drivers to make certain that they are properly insured. They can help themselves by dealing through reputable intermediaries or direct with authorised insurance companies. They should always ensure that they know the name of the insurer carrying their risk as well as the name of any intermediary with whom they deal. If they have doubts about the status of the insurer, they may contact the Motor Insurers Bureau for advice or, failing that, ask the Department. In the event that an uninsured motorist is involved in an accident the Motor Insurers Bureau will meet a third party claim but may pursue the uninsured motorist for recompense.

Recently there has been an increase in the number of illegal motor insurance operations coming to the attention of the Department. The list gives the names of those who over the last three months are believed to have issued motor insurance without proper underwriting by an authorised insurer. In addition, a further four cases are currently being investigated to establish whether the issuers of the insurance are acting legally. Many of these cases have involved targeting particular groups of motorists who have been affected by rises in insurance premiums. For example, young drivers and those with convictions may be attracted by the unusually attractive rates offered.

Those running illegal operations will usually advertise their products in a very limited way. Thus advertising may be restricted to particular local areas or limited to distribution of leaflets to domestic premises. By these means they seek to minimise risk of detection. Such approaches should be treated with some caution. As with all fraudulent activity, it is the responsibility of those paying money to take reasonable precautions against being duped.

Jordan (Exports)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the total number of export licences awarded by his Export Control Office for equipment sent to Jordan since 1985; and what information Her Majesty's Government have received on compliance with end-use certificates of goods exported to Jordan over this period.

Mr. Needham: A complete breakdown of figures for the number of licences issued for Jordan is not readily available. However, the following table shows applications received and licences issued where available:

Year	Applications received	Licences issued
1985	n/a	n/a
1986	200	n/a
1987	340	n/a
1988	310	n/a
1989	138	n/a
1990	155	47
1991	104	69
[1]1993	39	13

[1] 1 January 1993 to 30 April 1993.

Information on compliance with end-use certificates is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Export Guarantee Funds

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much of the £1 billion fund created in 1988 under section 2 of the Export Guarantees and Overseas Investment Act 1978 has been used.

Mr. Needham: ECGD has issued guarantees worth £834·2 million against the ceiling of £1 billion under the arrangements which Ministers announced in June 1988 for underwriting large contracts for defence goods.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the outstanding liabilities, and the annual cost, of expenditure incurred under section 2 of the Export Guarantees and Overseas Investment Act 1978 in each year since 1979.

Mr. Needham: Information on section 2 is only available up to March 1987 after which ECGD introduced a new form of account under which information was no longer accounted for separately between section 1 and section 2.

The information has been published in ECGD's trading accounts from 1979-80, copies of which can be found in the Library. For convenience the relevant details are brought together in the following table:

	Amounts at risk[1] £ million	Amounts in default[2] £ million	Consolidated fund balance[3] £ million	Trading reserves and surpluses[4] £ million
31 March 1980	8,177	77	342·0	309·3
31 March 1981	8,465	94	371·3	364·5
31 March 1982	12,266	180	380·6	454·6
31 March 1983	17,737	403	166·0	680·3

31 March 1987	14,821	1,549	−510·0	297·2

[1] These amounts represent ECGD's gross contingent liability under extant guarantees excluding unrecovered claims payments.
[2] These comprise gross paid claims, plus interest, which have not been recovered or written off.
[3] These amounts represent ECGD's cumulative cash balance under Section 2. Notional interest in line with commercial rates was earned on positive balances and charged on negative balances.
[4] These amounts represent the cumulative value of ECGD's assets (positive cash balances, paid claims net of provisions) over its liabilities (negative cash balances, provisions for future claims).

Mothballed Collieries

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if collieries which are to be mothballed will have their shafts, roadways, and coal faces maintained; if water pumping operations will be maintained at collieries where this is necessary; and if he will give details of what the mothballing process consists of.

Mr. Eggar: This is a matter for British Coal.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what permits, licences or grants have been given by the nuclear installations inspectorate/Health and Safety Executive, in the recent and current rounds of the licensing procedure for THORP, for radioactive processes and/or the use of radioactive substances in THORP, other than the reception and storage of irradiated fuel.

Mr. Eggar: The regulation of THORP, which is undertaken by the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate (NII), is effected by conditions attached to the nuclear site licence for Sellafield. As regards the commissioning of THORP the NII has not yet permitted the introduction of radioactive material except for small amounts of natural uranium needed to calibrate certain instruments.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what account has been taken of (a) the Tomsk-7 and (b) the 1973 B204 Sellafield accidents in the design of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 4 May 1993]: This is a matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc (BNFL) but I understand that all relevant factors, including lessons learned from the accident at B 204 Sellafield, have been taken fully into account by BNFL in the design and construction of THORP. In addition, the Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate ensures that the design of nuclear plant such as THORP meets the high standards of safety they require.

Metric and Imperial Measures

Mr. Alexander: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will enable consumers to compare the price of metric and imperial measured catch-weight goods by waiving the statutory requirement to show dead-weight marking on them so that display of comparison weight can be made by means of charts at the premises.

Mr. Leigh: The Government are reviewing the present statutory requirement for dual price marking.

Postal Deliveries

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has, in his plans for the universal letter service at a uniform tariff following the Post Office review, for the provision of a second daily domestic delivery in most areas of the country.

Mr. Leigh: There are no plans to change the overall arrangements.

Coal Stocks

Mr. Churchill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what have been the average level of coal stocks held (a) by British Coal and (b) by the generators in each of the past five years; and what guidance he is giving each in respect of stock levels in the current and two subsequent years.

Mr. Eggar: The average levels of coal stocks held by the electricity generators and British Coal in each of the last five years were:

	British Coal (thousand tonnes)	United Kingdom electricity generators (thousand tonnes)
1988	6,105	25,813
1989	9,851	27,975
1990	8,593	26,895
1991	9,827	28,942
1992	12,632	31,989

The current stocking requirements are set out in the Government's White Paper, "The Prospects for Coal"

(Cmnd 2235). As envisaged in the White Paper, consultations are taking place about stocking arrangements for 1993-94 and following years.

Oil Exploration

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what specific conditions have been imposed on oil exploration licences issued to Marathon Oil for blocks 103/1, 103/6, 106/27, 102/10, 106/18, 106/19 and 106/23.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 304.

Energy and Environment Council

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the issues discussed and decisions taken at the joint Energy and Environment Council held on 23 April.

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside and I represented the United Kingdom at a joint session of the Energy and Environment Councils on 23 April to review progress in relation to the Community strategy on climate change. Discussion focused on the proposal for a Community carbon/energy tax and the concept of burden-sharing in achieving the carbon dioxide stabilisation objective. We noted that the Economic and Financial Council had concluded last December that a great deal more work was needed before it could take any decisions on whether a tax was needed and, if so, what form it should take. This work was under way and, in the meantime, it was premature to seek to commit member states to the principle of a Community-wide carbon/energy tax. The United Kingdom was not yet convinced that such a tax was either a necessary or appropriate response to the problem of global warming. A number of other member states who were willing to accept the principle of a Community tax made clear that they could do so only on the basis that they would be exempted from applying the tax as part of the proposed burden-sharing arrangement. No decisions were taken or agreement reached, on the proposed tax or on the structure of burden-sharing.

The Council also discussed a Commission report on Community assistance to eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union to improve the safety of nuclear reactors, in which the United Kingdom and others called for improved implementation of Community programmes.

The Commission announced that it would shortly submit proposals for a new Council regulation on ozone-depleting substances.

British Coal Pension Scheme

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his Department has given or offered an indemnity to British Coal against any liability that might fall upon the corporation as a consequence of the deferment of payments of additional contributions to the British Coal staff superannuation scheme.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 4 May 1993]: No indemnity has been given or offered to British Coal for any such liabilities.

Waste Disposal Contracts

Mr. O'Neill: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 306, if a municipal waste-to-energy scheme which had been granted a waste disposal contract relatively soon after a third tranche of the non-fossil fuel obligation is announced would be eligible to bid into the new order.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 4 May 1993]: Provided that such a project met the other requirements, I would expect it to be eligible to bid.

Dounreay

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a further statement on progress made by AEA Technology at the Dounreay nuclear establishment to secure the import of spent research reactor nuclear fuel from Iraq.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 30 April 1993]: The IAEA issued a formal invitation, on 27 November 1992, to tender for the removal, transport and disposal of irradiated fuel stored in Iraq. No tender was submitted by the United Kingdom nuclear industry.

Innovation Schemes

Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will provide information on the take up of each of the (a) Smart, (b) Spur, (c) advanced technology programmes, (d) Link and (e) Eureka innovation schemes;

(2) if he will outline the expenditure, in constant prices, on each of the (a) Link, (b) advanced technology programmes, (c) Smart, (d) Spur amd (e) Eureka schemes.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 30 April 1993]: Information on take-up of the schemes listed is represented by the number of projects for which offers were accepted. Information on expenditure is presented in 1992-93 prices.

Regional Development Funding

Mr. Milburn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the level of European regional development funding in each region in each year since 1984 (a) at current prices and (b) at 1984 prices.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 4 May 1993]: European regional development fund allocations, in current and 1984 prices, to each of the regions of the United Kingdom are given in the tables:

"The Abuse of Market Power"

Mr. Dewar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list all the individuals and bodies from which his Department received written or oral representation in connection with the Green Paper, "The Abuse of Market Power".

Mr. Neil Hamilton [holding answer 4 May 1993]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the summary of responses to the Green Paper which was placed in the Vote Office when I announced to the House on 14 April the Government's decision to strengthen the existing legislation on abuse of market power. An appendix to the summary lists those who made representations on the Green Paper.

WALES

Fords

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many fords there are in Wales where public roads cross watercourses; how many fatal or serious accidents have occurred in each of the last 10 years as a result of vehicles failing to negotiate water on fords on public roads; if he will list fords which have been closed to traffic following such accidents; and what is his Department's policy towards fords and the provision of warning to motorists when water conditions may be dangerous.

Sir Wyn Roberts: There are no fords crossing trunk roads in Wales. Information on local authority roads is not held centrally. There are warning signs prescribed in the Traffic Signs Regulations and General Directions 1981 which local authorities can use to alert drivers to the existence of a ford and to the depth of water.

Valleys Initiative

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the town-village regeneration schemes that have been undertaken under the valleys initiative to date, indicating the amount spent by his Department on each scheme; and if he will list forthcoming town-village centre regeneration schemes to be funded under the valleys initiative in the forthcoming year.

Mr. David Hunt: The table shows the urban development schemes which have been and will be funded by the Welsh Development Agency in the period from 1988 to 1994:

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the environmental improvement schemes undertaken as part of the valleys initiative in each year from 1990; and if he will list forthcoming environmental schemes to be developed under the initiative in (a) 1993 and (b) 1994.

Mr. David Hunt: Under the programme for the valleys the Welsh Deveiopment Agency has supported 134 environmental improvement schemes since 1990.

Projects have included:	£
Garden Festival Approaches	383,000
Dowlais Top landscape works (Part of WDA/Welsh Office heads of valleys corridor project)	114,000
Landscape Works: Rassau and Garnlydan Housing Estate Blaenau Gwent	76,000
Landscape Works: Cefn Golau Housing Estate	17,000
Taff Trail long distance cycleway	95,000
Taff Valley Coed Cymru initiative	18,000
Alltwen Triangle landscaping	20,000
Brynamen Road landscaping Gwaun Cae Gurwen	25,000
Seven Sisters town centre improvements	48,000
Resolven town centre improvements	68,000
Resolven canal basin	50,000

In addition many environmental improvement projects have been supported by the urban programme and by groundwork trusts. It would not be possible to list every individual scheme other than at disproportionate cost.

Future Development

The WDA will be promoting a number of landscape and forest strategies in the valleys programme area. Four areas have so far been identified, namely:

Blaenau Gwent, Rhymney, Rhondda and Ogwr.

In each case there will be a package of action based on a landscape masterplan including the planting of new woodlands, management of existing woodlands, the upgrading of land reclamation sites, and a range of amenity creation and landscape projects in the urban fringe. These will be achieved in partnerships which will include local authorities, the Forest Authority and the Countryside Council for Wales.

Drugs and Alcohol

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he has issued to local councils in relation to their responsibilities for drug and alcohol misusers under the community care arrangement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Advice was issued to Welsh county councils on 1 April 1993 in Welsh Office circular WHC(93)30, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. This advice covers the councils' responsibilities to assess the needs of alcohol and drugs misusers and to plan and arrange appropriate services for these individuals under the general community care arrangements. It includes reference to residential care arrangements.

Income Statistics

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the poorest 10 per cent. of the population of Wales were (a) pensioners, (b) families with children and (c) single people with children in each year since 1979.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the estimated real income after housing costs of (a) the richest 10 per cent. of the population of Wales and (b) the poorest 10 per cent. in each year since 1979 and what was the average real income in Wales in each year since 1979;

(2) what estimates he has of the number of households in Wales that currently have debts owing to three or more creditors and what was the number in (a) 1981 (b) 1985 and (c) 1990.

Mr. David Hunt: This information is not available centrally.

Local Government Ombudsman

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current state of the outstanding caseload for the local government ombudsman in Wales for cases waiting (a) three months, (b) six months and (c) nine months or longer to be investigated.

Mr. David Hunt: The Commission for Local Administration is an independent statutory body and questions relating to its activities are for the Commission itself to answer.

The annual reports of the Local Commissioner, copies of which are in the Library of the House, provide statistics on the number of complaints received and the time taken to deal with them. The report for 1992-93 is likely to be available in June.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received to date in support of the local Government reform proposals set out for Dwyfor; and if he will indicate the number of representations received that were in favour of granting independent unitary authority status for (a) Meirionnydd and (b) Montgomery.

Mr. David Hunt: Since publishing my White Paper on 1 March 1993, I have received one written representation in support of a Caernarfonshire and Meirionnyddshire unitary authority. In addition, I have received 10 representations in favour of a Meirionnydd unitary authority and 181 representations in favour of a Montgomeryshire unitary authority. I have also received 4,135 signed postcards in favour of unitary authority status for Montgomeryshire.

Bypass Schemes

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the estimated cost of the proposed Builth Wells bypass, the estimated number of vehicles per day that will use it, the estimated timescale for completion, the length of delays currently experienced by drivers and the present level of accidents in Builth Wells.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The estimated cost of the Builth Wells bypass is £15 million (at out-turn prices). Depending on which route is chosen, some 6,500 vehicles a day could use the new road. The anticipated two year construction contract is currently programmed to start between April 1996 and March 1999, subject to the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures and the availability of funds. Traffic delays presently vary according to the time and season, but are particularly significant in the summer months. At the southern end of the proposed scheme, and in the town centre, the accident rate is above the national average. For the remainder, it is about the national average.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all (a) town/village bypass schemes and (b) traffic calming measures undertaken by his Department within the south Wales valleys in each year from 1990; and if he will list the schemes which are intended to be developed in (i) 1993 and (ii) 1994.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The primary responsibility for the road network in the south Wales valleys rests with local authorities. No bypass schemes or traffic calming measures have been introduced in the valleys on trunk roads for which I am responsible since 1990. The A465 Aberdulais to Glynneath and the A470 Pentrebach to Cefn Coed improvements which it is planned to start in 1993-94 will each by-pass local communities. Road conditions are kept under review, but no specific traffic calming measures are planned on trunk roads in the valleys in 1993 or 1994.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the 1993-94 budget for each training and enterprise council in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Welsh Office are currently finalising contracts with TECs for 1993-94 budgets and the information is not yet available.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received in favour of his proposals to transfer the communities of Coychurch Lower, Ewenny, Saint Bride's Major and Wick into the Vale of Glamorgan, under his proposals for unitary authorities, from people living in these communities.

Mr. David Hunt: Since publishing my White Paper on 1 March 1993, I have received four such written representations in favour of my proposals to incorporate the communities of Coychurch Lower, Ewenny, Saint Bride's Major and Wick into a Vale of Glamorgan unitary authority.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much will be spent or has been spent in each year from 1990-91 to 1995-96 on (a) stage 1 ESAs, (b) stage 2 ESAs, (c) stage 3 ESAs and (d) stage 4 ESAs, identifying how much of the total is allocated for the public access payments; what is the amount to be spent on (i) nitrate sensitive areas, (ii) the moorland scheme, (iii) the habitat improvement scheme, (iv) set aside management, identifying how much of the total will be for public access payments and (v) organic farming in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The information is as follows: Expenditure on ESA payments to farmers in Welsh ESAs was £0·9 million in 1990-91, £1·5 million in 1991-92 and £1·5 million in 1992-93.

Planned expenditure is £5·8 million in 1993-94, £7·6 million in 1994-95 and £7·8 million in 1995-96.

Public consultation proposals have been issued for public access to ESA land. Planned expenditure is £0·51 million in 1994-95 and £0·52 million in 1995-96. In addition to this expenditure on ESAs, we have also issued for public consultation proposals for a moorland scheme, a habitat improvement scheme, a meadowland scheme for public access to set-aside land and an organic scheme. Current plans for expenditure on payments to farmers under these new measures is £0·5 million in 1993-94, £2·4 million in 1994-95 and £4·8 million in 1995-96. The precise allocation between the schemes will be decided in the light of the results of the public consultation. I have no plans to designate any nitrate sensitive areas (NSAs) in Wales.

Pharmaceutical Services (Mold)

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the factors upon which he based his decision to classify Mold and its outlying districts as a non-rural area for the purposes of the provision of pharmaceutical services.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Questions affecting the rurality of an area are governed by the National Health Service (Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations, 1992. In considering the issue the Secretary of State has regard to the overall density of population, including any developments or population changes which may be expected; sizes of community; distance between settlements and the spread and frequency of public transport, together with the range of local services available.

Death Rates

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what guidelines he has issued, and what proposals he has to issue further guidelines, to health authorities and general practitioner fund-holding practices in Wales concerning the implications for purchasers of hospital health care of statistically significant variations in death rates in or just after treatment; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consultations he has had with the health authorities and hospital trusts in Wales in relation to the variations in performance in hospitals with respect to death rates during or just after hospital treatment;

(3) what representations he has received with respect to the publication of league tables in relation to variations between hospitals in death rates during or just after surgery and other treatments (a) with and (b) without standardisation for age and social condition of patient intake; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will publish figures indicating the gap between the highest and lowest death rate hospitals, with respect to death rates after (a) general surgery, (b) orthopaedic surgery and (c) other treatments, after standardising for age and social condition of the patient intake; and what proposals he has for improviong the performance of the hospitals with death rates related to treatment, that are markedly above average;

(5) what is the maximum differential gap in death rates between the lowest and highest death rate in Welsh hospitals following (a) general surgery, (b) orthopaedic surgery and (c) other treatments; and what proposals he has for improving the performance of these hospitals whose death rates after surgical treatment is higher than the norm.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 30 April 1993 at column 589.

National Lottery

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the finances that would accrue in a full year, after the deduction of all tax and other costs, from the national lottery to (a) sport in Wales, (b) performing arts in Wales, (c) other arts' activities in Wales and (d) other organisations or activities by type and category; and what percentage will be applied to revenue costs and capital costs, respectively, in each case.

Mr. David Hunt: It is not possible to predict how much the various categories of beneficiaries will receive from the national lottery. Distribution arrangements are the subject of discussions with the distributing bodies and with other Government Departments, and the relevant criteria will be published in due course. With the exception of charities, I expect the proceeds to be used for the most part for capital projects.

Strategy Resettlement Funding

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table showing all housing associations and other organisations which have applied for all-Wales strategy resettlement funding for 1993-94, the figure applied for in each case and the figure actually agreed by his Department.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Housing associations receive funding for strategy-related housing through Housing for Wales as part of their special needs programme. Special grants are made to county teams who negotiate and commission care at a local level with care management organisations. The programme for resettlement for this year (1993-94) will evolve during the year. However, the full year costs to counties to supply a comprehensive package of care, including accommodation for 110 individuals is estimated to be £5 million to the Welsh Office.

Grants

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what objectives he has set (a) each section of his Department and (b) each quango or body responsible in whole or in part to his Department for (i) the publication of information or criteria relating to grants available for 1993-94 (ii) the time to elapse between publication date and closing date (iii) the time for notification of a decision after the publication date and closing date, respectively, and (iv) the information to be provided to any unsuccessful applicant.

Mr. David Hunt: These matters differ from grant to grant and organisation to organisation. The information requested is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Hospital Services (South Glamorgan)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1992, Official Report, column 125, about the strategic plan for hospital services in South Glamorgan, what is his current estimate of the completion date of the strategic hospital planning review of South Glamorgan health authority.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: While the issues of timing and content still remain a matter for the health authorities in South Glamorgan, I understand the issue of the review is imminent. I await it with interest.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the chairmen of the South Glamorgan and Mid Glamorgan health authorities and the provost of the Welsh national school of medicine concerning the strategic review of future hospital and bed supply and demand and regional services provision; what is his current estimate of the prospective completion date of the review; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones [holding answer 30 April 1993]: The review known as "Collaboration on Commissioning", which was completed in December 1992, is a matter for the health authorities and the University of Wales college of medicine.

My right hon. Friend has had no meeting with the chairmen of South Glamorgan or Mid Glamorgan health authorities to discuss this review.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Job Statistics

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many new jobs have been created in the past two years, how many of these are now in existence; how many jobs have been lost during the same period; and if he will give details of the types of jobs created and lost.

Mr. Atkins: Information on new job creations is not available except to the extent that 2,500 new jobs were created with assistance from the Local Enterprise Development Unit in the calendar year 1991 and 2,490 with assistance from the Industrial Development Board in the financial year 1991-92. All of these jobs were in the manufacturing and services sectors. Information on how many of these are still in existence could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Figures for jobs created in 1992 and 1992-93 are not yet available. The table shows redundancies notified to the Department of Economic Development in 1991 and 1992 and the sectors in which they occurred.

Confirmed redundancies

Housing Development, Newtownards

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the application for housing development at The Oaks, Old Shore road, Newtownards —planning application No. 0028/93—has within his ownership or agreement with other landowners the land required to provide the sight lines in both directions from the entrance of the proposed development on to the public road.

Mr. Atkins: The certificate of land ownership which accompanied the application requires further investigation and I will write to the hon. Gentleman once this has been carried out.

Donaghadee Urban District Council

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, whether his Department has copies of the minutes of meetings of the former Donaghadee urban district council.

Mr. Atkins: Copies of the minutes of meetings of the former Donaghadee urban district council are held in the Public Record Office. The minutes signed on 7 August 1945, show that the council approved a plan to divide Warren house, Donaghadee into two flats. However, as indicated in my reply of 26 April, the Department does not have a copy of any decision document pursuant to this meeting of the council.

Ports Privatisation

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will amend the draft Ports (Northern Ireland) Order 1993 so as to make the exercise of the proposed powers to privatise ports in Northern Ireland compulsorily subject to the affirmative parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Atkins: This issue has been raised in a number of the representations received during the consultation period on the draft Ports (Northern Ireland) Order 1993. The responses have been extremely wide-ranging and I am considering them in detail before taking any decisions on the way forward.

Health Service Wages

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total wage bill of hospital and community health services staff in each board area, in each of the last five years and projected for the next two years, broken down into the principal groups of staff, including consultants, junior doctors and nurses.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 April 1993]: The information is not readily available in the form requested. The Northern Ireland health and social services boards provide integrated health and personal social services. The boards' accounts for 1992-93 are currently being prepared. However, for the last five years for which accounts are available the salaries and wages bill for each board are set out in the tables. It is not possible to provide accurate forecasts of future pay bills, although for the current financial year the Government's public sector pay restraint policy is designed to hold settlements to 1 per cent.

Community Midwives

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many community midwives are employed by each health board in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 30 April 1993]: The number of community midwives employed by each health and social services board at 31 December 1992 was as follows:

Board	Number	Whole-time equivalent
Eastern	61	57·45
Northern	35	31·13
Southern	27	23·65

Mr. Nelson: The information is not available in the precise form requested because the equivalence scale used is based on households rather than adults. In addition the figures are only available at current prices.

Percentages are rounded independently and may not sum to row or column totals.

Households with children have fallen as a proportion of the sample from 39 per cent. in 1979 to 33 per cent. in 1990. This is the main reason that their share of income has fallen from 37 per cent. in 1979 to 30 per cent. in 1990. The variation in the shares of income between household types by quintile group is mainly a reflection of the different composition of the quintile groups.

These figures are not strictly comparable over time because of changes in classification of both income and taxation and because of changes in the family expenditure survey.

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total value of equivalised disposable income, at 1990 prices, for all households for the years 1977 to 1990, on the basis given in Economic Trends for January 1993, page 187.

Mr. Nelson: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The total value of equivalised disposable income for households in the sample at current prices can be obtained by multiplying the sample size by the average equivalised disposable income. It is not possible to calculate the total value for all households in the United Kingdom as the appropriate grossing factors are not available.

The average values of equivalised disposable income for all households for alternate years from 1977 to 1987 and for 1988 are published in the March 1991 edition of "Economic Trends", the average values for 1989 and 1990 are published in the January 1992 and January 1993 editions respectively. The January 1993 edition of "Economic Trends" has references to the annual articles.

Ms Corston: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average value in 1979, 1987 and 1990, at 1990 prices per equivalent adult in households with children of (a) contributory benefits in cash, (b) non-contributory benefits in cash, (c) direct taxes, (d) indirect taxes, (e) equivalised disposable income, (f) benefits in kind and (g) final income, within the bottom and top quintiles of all households ranked by disposable income.

Mr. Nelson: The information is not available in the precise form requested because the equivalence scale used is based on households rather than adults. In addition, the figures are available only at current prices.

[1] Using the McClements equivalence scale with a household of a married couple = 1.

Notes:
Due to possible mis-recording of some non-contributory benefits as contributory benefits, the split between the two types of benefit should be treated with caution.
The equivalence scales used in the analysis are only applicable to disposable income. It is not appropriate to apply them to other income measures or composite parts of those measures.
These figures are not strictly comparable over time because of changes in classification of taxes and benefits and because of changes in the Family Expenditure Survey.

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the (a) total income of the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers, (b) unearned income of the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers, (c) unearned income of all taxpayers, (d) total number of taxpayers and (e) number of taxpayers in the top 1 per cent. in each year since 1979;

(2) what was the total unearned income of (a) all taxpayers and (b) the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers divided into income from (i) shares and securities, (ii) bank and interest-bearing accounts, (iii) building societies accounts and deposits, (iv) rents, (v) pensions and annuities and (vi) other, with details for each year since 1979.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 4 May 1993]: Available information is given in the tables. Estimates of income are based on information reported to tax offices and collected through annual surveys of personal incomes. For years before 1985-86, estimates exclude employees' contributions to occupational pension schemes and some investment income on which tax is deducted at source. It is therefore not possible to provide estimates of the total unearned income of all taxpayers, although information on the top 1 per cent. of taxpayers is available. For years up to and including 1989-90, married couples are counted as one taxpayer and their incomes are combined. Following the introduction of independent taxation, for 1990-91 onwards, husbands and wives are counted separately. Estimates for 1991-92 and 1992-93 are based on projections of the 1990-91 survey and are therefore provisional, and detailed information on the breakdown of unearned income is not available.

Employment Earnings

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total earnings in (a) cash and (b) real terms from self-employment and employment in the manufacturing and service sectors by standard industrial classification of the earnings source in (a) 1963, (b) 1974, (c) 1979 and (d) the most recent period for which information is available; and what were the percentage changes for each sector between each of those successive dates.

Mr. Nelson: Figures for income from employment in the manufacturing and service sectors, analysed on the basis of the standard industrial classification in use at the time of publication, may be found in the following CSO publications:

1963 National Income and Expenditure 1963-73: tables 18 and 20 (wages and salaries only).

1974 (on 1968 Standard industrial Classification): National Income and Expenditure 1982 edition: tables 3.1 and 3.3.

1974 (on 1980 classification) and later years may be found in the appropriate issues of the National Accounts Blue Book, Tables 2.1 and 2.3, and also on the CSO database, which can be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

Estimates of income from self-employment by sector are not available.

There are no official estimates of components of personal incomes measured at constant prices.

Ministers' Accommodation

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to tax the benefits in kind received by Ministers who have access to official accommodation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I have no plans to change the tax treatment of any accommodation provided for Ministers.

London and Bishopsgate Investment Management

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on what date London and Bishopsgate International Investment Management plc applied to his Department for a principal's licence to carry on the business of dealing in securities under the provisions of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958.

Mr. Nelson: On 28 February 1988.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 13 January, Official Report, column 749, to which firm or sole trader, whose application was received after 27 February 1988, his Department granted a licence to carry on the business of dealing in securities under the provisions of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958.

Mr. Nelson: London and Bishopsgate International Investments Management plc.

Matrix Churchill

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer why a package sent recently, via Federal Express, by Mr. Douglas Franze from Washington, USA, addressed to Mr. Paul Henderson, a former managing director of Matrix Churchill, was inspected by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: As part of their general anti-smuggling activity Customs and Excise regularly examine a proportion of imported packages to check for undeclared goods and to protect society from the importation of items which are prohibited or restricted.

Petroleum Revenue Tax

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact upon the Scottish oil industry of the Budget proposals for changes in petroleum revenue taxation.

Mr. Dorrell: To the extent that production is within the charge to petroleum revenue tax (PRT), doubling investors' marginal share of profit should encourage investment in, and extend the life of, fields. Removing the burden of PRT from new fields will both increase after-tax costs and increase after-tax profits that would have been subject to PRT. So companies will have greater incentives to undertake commercially-viable investment. That should prove beneficial to the United Kingdom offshore industry and its onshore support, including onshore support situated in Scotland.

Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the total exploration and appraisal relief given against PRT liabilities over the last three years was allocated to (a) wells, (b) seismic, (c) overheads, (d) insurance and (e) other expenditure.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that the information requested is not available.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to receive the Audit Commission report into local government finance.

Mr. Robin Squire: I understand that the Audit Commission plan to publish its report into standard spending assessments around the middle of May.

Local Government Reform

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the reasons for creating a commission to investigate local Government reform in England.

Mr. Robin Squire: We established the Local Government Commission to make recommendations on local government structure and boundaries having regard to the need to reflect the identities and interests of local communities and to secure effective and convenient local government, against the background of a variety of existing local authorities in England.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities, of each type, existed in England on 31 March 1974; how many of each type now exist; and when he expects the commission on local government reform to report.

Mr. Robin Squire: In England, on 31 March 1974 there were:

	Number
County councils	45
Greater London council	1
County boroughs	79
Non-county boroughs	227
Urban district councils	449
Rural district councils	410
London boroughs	32
City of London	1

At present there are:

	Number
County councils	39
Shire district councils	296
Metropolitan district councils	36
London boroughs	32
City of London	1

The Local Government Commission is carrying out its reviews of local government structure in the shire counties of England in rolling programme. The commission will be making recommendations to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State as it completes each review. The commission has submitted its final report on the future structure of local government on the Isle of Wight and it is currently reviewing the other areas in the first tranche of its work programme.

Estate Action

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many properties in Estate Action schemes have been disposed of to the private sector.

Mr. Baldry: Excluding properties sold under the right to buy, it is expected that some 29,000 dwellings will have been disposed of to the private sector by the end of 1993-94.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the present value of land held by each urban development corporation.

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 4 May 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on Wednesday 8 July 1992, Official Report, column 253.

Industrial and Provident Societies

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to amend the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts; and if his consultations about changes will include housing associations.

Mr. Nelson: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have no plans at present to amend the current legislation.

EMPLOYMENT

Radiation Exposure

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what changes she proposes to make in the occupational radiation exposure limits.

Mr. McLoughlin: The UK's radiation dose limits for workers, comply with the current EC (Euratom) Directive on basic standards for radiation protection. Revision of this directive, and the dose limits therein, will begin later this year. There are no plans to reduce dose limits in advance of revision of the directive.

Graduate

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures her Department is taking to reduce the number of university graduates who are unemployed.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Employment Department is providing a wider range of measures than ever before to provide all unemployed people, including graduates, with the help they need to find a job. Some of these measures may be particularly appropriate for graduates, for example job review workshops, job search seminars or executive jobclubs. Training and enterprise councils have discretion to tailor training for work programmes specifically for unemployed graduates.

Employment Statistics

Mr. Ray Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what percentage of female employees work (a) full time and (b) part time;

(2) what percentage of male employees work (a) full time and (b) part time.

Mr. McLoughlin: In December 1992, 54 per cent. of female employees in the United Kingdom worked full time and 46 per cent. worked part time. At the same date 89 per cent. of male employees worked full time and 11 per cent. worked part time.

Training

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on the youth training credit pilot schemes.

Mr. McLoughlin: On 8 March, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the next 10 training and enterprise councils (TECs) in England and Wales to be asked to develop youth credits. This round, the third in the progressive extension of the initiative, brings the number of TECs (and local enterprise companies in Scotland) offering or developing credits for young people to 34. The Government's aim is that, by 1996, every 16 and 17 year old who chooses to leave full-time education will have the offer of a credit.

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when she will publish guidelines for the operating of training for work schemes.

Mr. McLoughlin: Planning guidance for 1993-94 was issued to training and enterprise councils (TECs) on 4 December 1992. The operating agreement, setting out the contractual requirements for running training for work was issued to TECs during the first week in March.

Maternity Leave

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations she has received from employers and employers organisations on the extension of the 14-week maternity leave period set out in the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill to 18 weeks.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have received one letter from an employer and one from an employers' organisation calling for an extension of the maternity leave period to 18 weeks. The Government are, however, satisfied from the extensive consultations carried out on the EC Pregnant Workers Directive that the great majority of employers wish the burdens on business arising from its implementation to be kept to a minimum.

Health and Safety

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she has any plans to extend the pilot scheme currently running in Scotland involving public access to health and safety inspectors' reports.

Mr. McLoughlin: This exercise in making some information of inspectors reports publicly available was set up by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) on a pilot basis and encompasses reports on inspections made by the field operations division in Scotland from 5 January 1993. It is intended that the exercise will cover inspections made until at least 30 June. I am informed that the HSE will be evaluating the exercise over the next few weeks before deciding whether to extend it.

Mine Safety

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what actions she proposes to take to secure amendment to the regulations concerning mine safety; what proposals she has received to this end; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: In 1983 the Health and Safety Commission, which advises my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on health and safety legislation, put in hand a programme to renew mining legislation. Regulations have been made, and codes of practice approved, for safety of exits at mines, electricity at work at mines, explosives in coal and other safety-lamp mines, and shafts and winding in mines. My right hon. Friend has recently received proposals for regulations and an approved code of practice for the management and administration of safety and health at mines.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make it her policy in her consideration of changes to the safety regulations applying to mines to adhere to the principles relating to maintenance or improvement of existing regulations set out in section 1 of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974.

Mr. McLoughlin: The replacement of pre-1974 health and safety legislation is subject to section 1(2) of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 which requires such replacement to maintain or improve the standards of health, safety and welfare established by or under the earlier legislation.

The Health and Safety Commission and the Government are committed to the maintenance and improvement of safety standards within the mining industry and this will remain a constant and paramount objective.

Industrial Action

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will publish the number of days lost due to official and unofficial industrial action for each year since 1978; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Because of the practical difficulties in distinguishing between official and unofficial disputes such an analysis was discontinued in 1981. However, a special exercise for the Government's Green Paper "Unofficial Action and the Law", showed that approximately 1·3 million working days were lost in unofficial stoppages in 1988, more than one third of the 3·7 million days lost in the year. Data for 1978 to 1980 are as follows:

Year	Working days lost (Thousands)
	Known official	Unofficial and not known
1978	4,052	5,353
1979	23,512	5,962
1980	10,081	1,883

Wages Councils

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations she has received against the abolition of wages councils since the Trade Union and Employment Rights Bill received its Third Reading in the House.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 4 May 1993]: I have received a number of representations since Third Reading in the House, both supporting and opposing abolition. Since announcement of the Bill over 85 per cent. of letters from employers and employer bodies support abolition.

LORD CHANCELLORS DEPARTMENT

Juvenile Courts

Miss Lestor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many children were brought before juvenile courts in each of the last five years; and how many of them had school reports submitted on their behalf.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

Information on juveniles aged 10 and under 17 proceeded against at magistrates courts is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales". Table 6.1 refers. The latest available figures are for 1991; 1992 figures will be available in the autumn.

Information on the number of school reports submitted to youth courts is not collected centrally.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will hold an early meeting with representatives of the Turkish Cypriot community.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Our aim is to give effective support to the continuing inter-communal negotiations on Cyprus under UN auspices. The timing of any possible meeting with Turkish Cypriot representatives must be carefully considered in the light of progress in those negotiations.

Radio 4

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the United Kingdom's ambassador in Bonn has taken in respect of the petition received signed by listeners in Germany on the retention of Radio 4 on long wave; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Her Majesty's ambassador in Bonn has forwarded the petition to London for the BBC, who are reviewing their future plans for transmitting Radio 4, taking into account the various representations which they are receiving.

Cambodia

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position the United Kingdom representative on the United Nations Security Council will take in relation to a continuing UN presence in Cambodia following the holding of elections there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: The mandate of the UN transitional authority in Cambodia (UNTAC) is due to end with the formation of a new Cambodian Government three months after the Constituent Assembly elections on 23-27 May. The UN is likely to maintain a strong presence in Cambodia after this through its specialised and humanitarian agencies and programmes, including for example UNESCO, FAO/WFP, UNDP and UNICEF.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what position the United Kingdom representative at the United Nations is taking in relation to requests for a war crimes tribunal or special genocide commission to investigate the actions of Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia.

Mr. Goodlad: No such proposal is currently under consideration at the United Nations. In the absence of an international tribunal with jurisdiction to try Pol Pot and the Khmer Rouge for genocide, Pol Pot and his associates would have to be brought before a competent Cambodian court. It is therefore for the new Cambodian Government to decide whether to bring them to trial. If this were to happen, we would be the last to object.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to assist the release of funds promised by the United Nations to Cambodia for reconstruction and the clearing of land mines.

Mr. Goodlad: The international community has pledged $880 million for the reconstruction of Cambodia over a number of years, of which some $94·3 million has been disbursed. The flow of international aid is likely to increase substantially once a new government is in place in Phnom Penh. We regret the failure so far of the Supreme National Council of Cambodia to sign an International Bank for Reconstruction and Development package to help with the reconstruction of Cambodia, and urge all Cambodian parties to reach agreement on this as soon as possible. We have pledged some $30 million of aid since October 1991 of which $23 million has been committed. We have contributed funds to the HALO Trust, a British non-governmental organisation involved in mine clearance in Cambodia and to the funding of the Cambodian mine action centre through our assessed contribution to the UN transitional authority in Cambodia.

Political Parties (Funding)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the information available to him on the systems of state funding for political parties in the G7 group of countries, and in the Council of Europe.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Commonwealth of Independent States

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the number of United Kingdom representatives in each of the constituent nations of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Mr. Goodlad: The numbers of United Kingdom-based staff are as follows:

	Number
Ukraine	19
Moscow	83
St. Petersburg	7
Kazakhstan	3

We propose to open posts in Azerbaijan, Uzbekistan and Belarus shortly. The other countries within the Commonwealth of Independent States are covered by United Kingdom staff based in Moscow.

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which states are in membership of the CSCE at the present time; and which of these belonged in November 1990.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are currently 53 states participating in the CSCE. A copy of the list has been placed in the Library of the House. This list also indicates which states belonged to the CSCE in November 1990.

Yugoslavia was suspended from participation in all CSCE activity in July 1992. The Czech Republic and Slovakia were admitted as separate countries on 1 January 1993. The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia was granted observer status at the committee of senior officials meeting on 28 April.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names and nationalities of the committee of senior officials of the CSCE.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Meetings of the committee of senior officials are attended by representatives from each CSCE participating state, either its representative (normally an Ambassador) in Vienna or a senior official from its Foreign Ministry. The United Kingdom is normally represented by Mr. David Logan, an assistant under-secretary at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. By way of illustration a list of delegates at the committee of senior officials meeting in Prague from 2-4 February has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the locations of all the offices of the secretariat, the committee of senior officials and all other institutions of the CSCE.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The main centre for CSCE institutions is Vienna where the following are located: the conflict prevention centre and its secretariat, the Vienna group of the committee of senior officials, the secretariat for the Forum for Security Co-operation and the secretariat facilities for the CFE treaty and open skies implementation group. The recently appointed secretary-general will also have his office in Vienna.

By tradition the committee of senior officials meets in Prague and is serviced by the CSCE secretariat there.

There are three other CSCE institutions: the CSCE Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights is situated in Warsaw; the office of the CSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities is in The Hague; the Parliamentary Assembly of the CSCE has its office in Copenhagen.

Finally, the CSCE has resident preventative diplomacy missions in a number of conflict or potential conflict areas and sanctions assistance missions in countries neighbouring Serbia and Montenegro.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the subsidiary working bodies, committees and structures established by the committee of senior officials of the CSCE together with the names and nationalities of their members.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Council of Ministers of the CSCE, meeting in Stockholm in December 1992, instructed representatives of participating states to meet regularly in Vienna between sessions of the committee of senior officials (CSO). This body is now known as the CSO Vienna group.

Ad Hoc groups of all participating states may also be formed to deal with a specific task. These are then dissolved after their task has been completed. There are currently ad hoc groups dealing with the management of CSCE resources and with CSCE structures and institutions. A group will shortly be established to consider the legal status of CSCE institutions.

An informal financial committee of experts meets as and when required to review the budgets proposed for CSCE institutions and activities and to make recommendations to the CSO.

Sudan

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of the Sudan about the arrest, detention, and release of members of the Umma party in Sudan in April.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We raised with the Sudanese the brief detention in April of Sadiq al-Mahdi, leader of the Umma party, and we shall continue to monitor cases of arbitrary arrest in the Sudan.

India

Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indian Government on behalf of Mr. Pritam Sing Kang and his case of mistaken identity at New Delhi airport.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The High Commission in New Delhi was not contacted at the time and has no trace of the incident, but has written twice to the foreigners regional registration officer requesting a report. It has not so far received a reply.

The Indian authorities alone decide who may or may not enter Indian territory and we have no standing to challenge their decision.

North Korea

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the decision of North Korea to withdraw from the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom is determined to maintain and strengthen the non-proliferation treaty. We deeply regret the announcement by North Korea on 12 March of their intention to withdraw from the Treaty. With the Treaty's other co-depositaries and with our European partners we have urged North Korea to reconsider their position. We are now participating actively in discussions in the United Nations Security Council aimed at ensuring North Korea's compliance with their treaty obligations.

Gibraltar

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the procedure necessary to provide for the election by Gibraltar of a member of the European Parliament; and what is the Government's policy on this issue.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Gibraltar does not participate in elections to the European Parliament. We have no plans to change this situation. Annex II of the EC Act on Direct Elections of 1976 limits the franchise for elections to the European Parliament to the United Kingdom.

Entry Clearance

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the estimated cost of the proposed monitoring officer examining refusals of entry clearance where there is no right of appeal.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: It is too early to make firm costings.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community's Council of Ministers.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The following meetings are planned:

4 May:	Industrial Affairs Council
10 May:	Telecommunications Council
10-11 May:	Foreign Affairs Council
11 May:	Foreign Affairs/Gulf Cooperation Council
17 May:	Cultural Affairs Council

(h) Health Council—27 May
Resolution of future actions in the field of public health
Conclusions on reduction of consumption of tobacco
Policy debate on tobacco advertising
Conclusions on "Europe against AIDS" programme
Conclusions on "Europe against Cancer" programme (poss)
Conclusions on "Smoking in Public Places"—(5867/93)

The Industrial Affairs Council will meet on 4 May and will discuss restructuring of the steel industry of the Community; ECSC Treaty; Industrial competitiveness and environmental protection. Ministers will also discuss state aid for shipbuilding and maritime industries. There will be a policy discussion on small and medium sized enterprises.

The Telecommunications Council will meet on 10 May to attempt to reach a common position on ONP voice telephony. Adoption of Council conclusions on the Commission Communication on the European Telecommunication Equipment Industry will be sought. Ministers will seek to adopt the proposed decision on the introduction of advanced television services. Adoption is also sought on the proposed Council resolution on the development of Technology and Standards in the Advanced Television Sector. The Postal Services Green paper is also scheduled for discussion.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 10-11 May. EC Foreign Ministers will consider Trade Policy Questions; relations with the EP; Commission report on access to information. Ministers will also consider Russia; Central and Eastern Europe and Ex-Yugoslavia.

The Foreign Affairs/Gulf Cooperation Council will meet on 11 May to discuss the implementation of the Cooperation agreement. Ministers will also exchange views on developments in the two regions and on questions of political interest.

The Cultural Affairs Council will meet on 17 May. The agenda has not yet been finalised, but the European Cultural Month 1995, the media programme, and the Artemis programme are likely to be discussed. There may also be a draft resolution to create a scheme for the translation of dramatic works. Future work on books and reading may also be discussed.

The Agricultural Council will meet on 24-25 May. Ministers will discuss price fixing; milk, sugar; cereal quality; GATT; potatoes; CAP reform and Portuguese wine distillation.

The Development Council is planned for 25 May. The agenda has not yet been finalised, but development Cooperation in the run-up to 2000; Human Rights—Democracy and development; and Population Policy—family planning are likely to be discussed. Emergency Aid, Untying of Aid and women in development are also likely to be discussed. Ministers may also discuss UNCED follow-up and the "Special EC initiative for Africa".

The Health Council will meet on 27 May to discuss a resolution on future actions in the field of public health. Ministers will discuss the draft decision on the cancer programme which notes the Commission's report on the effectiveness of action undertaken in the "Europe Against Cancer" programme over the past five years. Ministers will discuss the conclusions on "Europe against AIDS" programme and the conclusions on reducing smoking in the Community which stress the importance of price as a mechanism to reduce tobacco consumption. The conclusions on smoking in public places will also be discussed.

UN Register of Conventional Arms Transfers

Mr. Booth: To the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what date the Government submitted to the United Nations' Secretary General a return from the United Kingdom to the UN register of conventional arms transfers in New York; and if he will place a copy of the return in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We submitted our first return to the UN Register to the UN Secretary General on 30 April. It covers major arms imports and exports during the calendar year 1992. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Mohammed Gham Ghani

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he is going to make a recommendation in the case (Ref: CON/4028) of Shenaz Begum, Afsar Khan and Shaira Begum, the children of Mr. Mohammed Gham Ghani, referred to his Department by the post in Islamabad on 2 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The immigration service interviewed Mr. Mohammed Ghani on 18 April. When a copy of the interview notes is received from them, the passport applications made to the British High Commission at Islamabad on behalf of Mr. Ghani's three children, will be considered again.

I will write to the hon. Member as soon as a decision has been made on this case.

Nuclear Energy

106. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what response Her Majesty's Government have made to the Commission's work programme 1993-94, SEC(93)58 Final published on 26 January; and what is his policy towards the proposal to change the scope of Euratom safeguards included in the programme.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The contents of the Commission work programme have been received and noted. There has been no official response by Her Majesty's Government but the work programme and an explanatory memorandum have been deposited in Parliament.

There is no direct reference in the work programme to Euratom safeguards.

Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations with non-governmental organisations the United Kingdom Government have been required or recommended to make prior to making submissions to the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights concerning article II of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; and which non-governmental organisations have been consulted prior to submissions being made.

Mr. Charles Wardle [holding answer 20 April 1993]: I have been asked to reply.

While there is no formal obligation to consult, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has welcomed contributions by non-governmental groups in the preparation of reports under the covenant.

I will write to the hon. Member about the second part of his question once necessary consultations with a number of other Government Departments is completed.

DEFENCE

Malaysia (Arms Contract)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which Minister signed the 1986 agreement with the Malaysian Government in respect of an arms contract; who signed on behalf of the Malaysian Government; what was the original estimated value of this contract; and what has been the delivered value of goods to date.

Mr. Aitken: I am not aware of any such agreement signed in 1986. My right hon. and noble Friend the former Prime Minister and the Malaysian Prime Minister Dr. Mahathir signed a memorandum of understanding in September 1988 under which the Malaysian Government agreed to purchase various military equipments from the United Kingdom. The terms of the MOU cannot be released from reasons of commercial confidentiality, but since the signature of the MOU the Malaysian Government and British industry have signed a number of contracts whose total value exceed £16 billion.

Civil Aircraft Notifications

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many notifications were made under the civil aircraft notification procedure in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The number of notifications made under the civil aircraft notification procedure in 1991 and 1992 is as follows:

Year	Number
1991	139
1992	535

The increase between 1991 and 1992 follows the raising of the height for notification of aerial activity under this procedure from 500 to 1,000 ft.

Low Flying

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints about low flying were received in each month since June 1991 from addresses in (a) Wales, (b) Scotland and (c) England.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The numbers of inquiries or complaints relating to military low flying training which my Department received over the period June 1991 to March 1993 from addresses in Wales, Scotland and England were as follows:

Month	Wales	Scotland	England
1991
June	95	52	274
July	159	62	605
August	101	100	644

March	48	106	347

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints were received about low-flying aircraft in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 in (i) England (ii) Wales and (iii) Scotland; and what proportion of such complaints related to (1) fast jets, (2) light jet trainers, (3) heavy propeller-driven aircraft, (4) light propeller-driven aircraft and (5) helicopters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The numbers of inquiries or complaints relating to military low flying training received in 1991 and 1992 from England, Scotland and Wales were as follows:

	Number of complaints
	1991	1992
England	3,412	4,401
Scotland	791	990
Wales	643	904

Information on the proportion of complaints by categories of aircraft could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the military low-level training sorties flown over the United Kingdon in each year since 1987 took place wholly or partly between the hours of 11 pm and 7 am.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not available. Central records of night low flying do not separately distinguish flying between the hours of 11 pm and 7 am. The aim is to complete low flying training before 11 pm wherever possible because it is recognised that aircraft noise can be particularly intrusive at night and only the minimum necessary of such activity is authorised.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) bird sanctuaries, (b) wildlife breeding sites and (c) nature reserves which are the subject of seasonal or permanent low-flying avoidance arrangements in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It remains our policy not to release detailed information on the United Kingdom military low-flying system. Fifty-seven sanctuaries, wildlife breeding sites and nature reserves are, however, the subject of seasonal or permanent low-flying avoidance arrangements.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the results of exercises held by the Royal Air Force since 1985 to measure the perceived noise on the ground, generated by overflying low-level military jet aircraft.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A copy of the report "Noise levels of military aircraft at low altitude: Exercise Luce Belle" is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-flying sorties were carried out over (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland during (i) 1991 and (ii) 1992.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is not available. A typical low-level sortie covers some 300 to 500 miles and commonly covers more than one of the areas mentioned. Fixed-wing low flying training is not currently undertaken in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will provide a monthly breakdown of the figures for low-level military training sorties over the United Kingdom since 1987.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations of Skyguard radars within the United Kingdom which are currently utilised to monitor low-flying activity.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Skyguard radar system used to monitor low flying activity within the United Kingdom is based at RAF Waddington. The radars are mobile and are deployed to various locations around the country to monitor low flying.

Bosnia

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which armoured vehicles currently deployed in Bosnia are to be replaced by vehicles from Germany, and why; at what cost; how they are to be transported; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The first battalion of the Prince of Wales Own Regiment are taking their own Warrior armoured vehicles with them and the first battalion of the Cheshire Regiment will return with their Warriors to Germany. The vehicles will be transported by ship. The cost of changing the vehicles is estimated at £300,000. The changeover is being done in order to spread the high mileage and very significant wear arising from operations in Bosnia across the fleet as a whole, thereby maintaining the best engineering management and reducing overall long-term costs to a minimum.

Tornados

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 242, if he will categorise by rank and specialisation the 227 ground personnel deployed with the six Tornados and two VC-10s to enforce the no-fly zone.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The 227 ground personnel were in support of the Tornados at Gioia del Colle; in addition there were 41 ground personnel deployed in support of the VC10 tankers at Sigonella. The 268 personnel are categorised as follows:

	Officers	Senior NCOs	Airmen	Total
Operations Support	7	2	2	11
Engineering and Supply	6	55	152	213
Administrative and catering	5	7	32	44
TOTAL	18	64	186	268

Drug Tests (Armed Forces)

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to introduce random drug tests for members of the armed forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The armed forces employ a range of measures to combat drug abuse. These measures are kept under review and the introduction of compulsory drug testing is an option we are considering.

Hunting

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on whose authority licences are issued to hunt on Ministry of Defence land; and how the terms and conditions of the licences are drawn up.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Licences are issued under the authority of the Secretary of State for Defence. The licences are different for each hunt to take into account the special needs of the host establishment.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Surrey Union hunt was first issued with a licence to hunt on Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: On 7 October 1991.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Army personnel were permitted to participate in cub hunting in 1991, 1992 and 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Army personnel from mounted units, and those involved in their training, are permitted to take part in a range of equestrian training activities, including cub hunting.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the terms and conditions of hunt licences permit any hunt to block up badger setts or permit the digging out of foxes on Ministry of Defence land;

(2) if he will make it his policy to include in any licences for hunting on Ministry of Defence land a requirement that the rules set out in the rules of the Masters of Foxhounds Association be adhered to.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which hunts currently have a licence to hunt on Ministry of Defence land and in which areas; and when these licences are due for renewal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The licences to hunt issued by my Department are due for renewal at various times. The hunts which had licences for the 1992-93 season were:

Brecon Farmers Hunt—Sennybridge Training Area
Sennybridge Farmers Hunt—Sennybridge Training Area
Irfon and Towey Hunt—Sennybridge Training Area
Glyn Celyn Beagles—Sennybridge Training Area
Blankney Hunt—Fulbeck and Beckingham Training Area
Surrey Union Hunt—Aldershot Military lands and Surrey Commons Training Area
West Shropshire Hunt—Nesscliffe Training Area
North Shropshire Hunt—Nesscliffe Training Area
Avon Vale Hunt—Salisbury Plain Training Area
South and West Wiltshire Hunt—Salisbury Plain Training Area
Royal Artillery Hunt—Salisbury Plain Training Area
Beaucaster Hunt—Spadeadam
Border Hunt—Otterburn Training Area
West Percy Hunt—Otterburn Training Area
Tynedale Hunt—Ouston Nr. Newcastle
Bedale Hunt—Catterick Training Area
Zetland Hunt—Feldom Training Area
Wensleydale Hunt—Catterick Training Area
West of York Hunt—Ellerton Banks
Catterick Beagles—Catterick Training Area
Newcastle Beagles—Otterburn Training Area

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all those fox hunts with which Ministry of Defence personnal are permitted to hunt in duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Personnel who are permitted to take part in fox hunting during duty hours may do so with any fox hunt in the country if they have the permission of the hunt secretary.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on how many occasions the Queens Royal Irish Hussars have participated in fox hunting; and with which hunts, in 1991, 1992 and 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: None.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the cost of the licenses held by the HMS Heron sporting gun club were last increased; by what percentage; and for how many years the licenses have been held.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: HMS Heron sporting gun club has held a licence to shoot at Merryfield airfield since 1974 and at Langport range since 1986. The licences were last reviewed in 1991 and there was no increase in the charges.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to restrict the involvement of armed forces personnel in fox hunting during duty hours.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Personnel from mounted units, and those involved in their training, are permitted to take part in fox hunting in duty hours at the commanding officer's discretion when it is not to the detriment of any other military task. Other personnel are not normally permitted to hunt during duty hours. No further restrictions are planned.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether any charge is made for Army personnel to use Army horses and equipment to hunt in off-duty hours; and on how many occasions Army personnel from non-mounted units have been permitted to hunt in duty hours in 1991, 1992 and 1993.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Army personnel from mounted units, and those involved in their training, are not permitted to use Army horses or equipment to hunt in off-duty hours. Army personnel from non-mounted units are required to pay for the hire of Army horses to hunt in off-duty hours. They would normally provide their own equipment.

Figures showing the number of occasions on which Army personnel from non-mounted units have been permitted to hunt in duty hours in 1991, 1992, and 1993 could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether cub hunting is permitted on Ministry of Defence land.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Yes.

Shooting Rights

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 29 March, Official Report, column 14, whether the Bulford and Tidworth garrison shoot is permitted to sell shooting days; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No.

Flying Training

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the percentage decrease or increase in the provision for Royal Air Force flying training activity in 1991-92 over 1990-91; and what changes in provision are being implemented this year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The tasked flying hours for 1991-92 showed a decrease of 3 per cent. over 1990-91. Tasked flying hours for 1993-94 are yet to be finalised.

Listed Buildings

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all the listed buildings currently owned by his Ministry; which he intends to sell; how many have been sold in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The following properties are currently for sale: Inverary pier, Faslane; Royal Marine barracks, Eastney; 28A Colliergate drill hall, York; former officers' mess, Maidstone; Forthside house, Stirling; Penisula barracks, Winchester and Bawdsey manor.

In addition, we are disposing of Royal William yard and Mount Batten tower in Plymouth which will be transferred to the Plymouth urban development corporation and Paterchurch tower, Pembroke dock which will be transferred to Pembrokeshire district council.

Other listed buildings have been indentified as possibilities for sale but have not yet been placed on the market. We intend, however, to review systematically all our historic buildings to determine which should be retained by the Ministry of Defence, in their current or alternative use, and which should be disposed of expeditiously to ensure their preservation by finding a suitable alternative use.

Information on sales in the last five years could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

British Hydrographic Service

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the work of the British Hydrographic Service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom Hydrographic Service is made up of four elements: the Ministry of Defence Hydrographic Department, which is responsible for operational policy on surveying and for planning defence and civil surveys; the Royal Navy Hydrographic Surveying Squadron, which conducts United Kingdom defence surveys and part of the civil survey task; the Ministry of Defence Hydrographic Office Defence Agency, which is responsible for the production of the British Admiralty charts and publications and other professional services to the Ministry of Defence; and the Royal Navy Hydrographic School, where Royal Navy and Foreign and Commonwealth students are given courses accredited by the International Hydrographic Organisation.

The detailed work of all these elements is summarised in the annual report of the Hydrographer of the Navy, which is laid before Parliament and copies of which are placed in the Library.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current and projected future cost of the British Hydrographic Service; and what is the current and proposed future establishment of the service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a breakdown by size and category of the number of vessels currently operated by the British Hydrographic Service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Hydrographic Survey Squadron currently consists of two ocean survey vessels of some 2,500 tonnes; three coastal survey vessels of between 1,400 and 1,100 tonnes; and one inshore survey craft of some 20 tonnes. In addition, the Hydrographic Survey Squadron operates two chartered vessels to undertake civil hydrographic surveys.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the revenue generated in each of the last 10 years by sales of charts and related information by the British hydrographic service (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) to overseas customers.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: This is a matter for the chief executive of the Hydrographic Office Defence Agency and I have asked him to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. A. L. Myres to Mr. Nicholas Winterton, dated 5 May 1993:

1. You recently asked the Secretary of State for Defence a Parliamentary Question concerning the revenue generated in each of the last 10 years by sales of charts and related information by the British Hydrographic Service (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) to overseas customers.

2. The Minister has asked me, as Chief Executive of the Hydrographic Office, to reply directly to you. The information you require can be found in the attached Annex. In amplification I should like to make two observations. Firstly, the term "charts and related information" has been defined as the sale of charts and hydrographic publications. Secondly, the revenue figures are, for reasons of comparison, expressed on a constant price basis, namely at 1992-93 prices.

3. I should also point out that charts and hydrographic publications are sold through a worldwide network of Admiralty Chart Agents. Whilst we have, on the basis of our invoice returns, been able to differentiate between sales to UK and overseas chart agents, it does not follow that an overseas chart agent will sell only to a user based overseas or vice versa.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to withdraw vessels operated by the British hydrographic service and for the replacement of such vessels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current ships of the Hydrographic survey squadron will be replaced, as this becomes necessary, with chartered vessels with naval crews or parties embarked as appropriate.

Reserve Forces

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to use members of the reserve forces in support of current operations.

Mr. Rifkind: I reported to the House by notice last October the call-out of a small number of willing officers of the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve to support current operations, and in November the Minister of State for the Armed Forces reported the call-out of a number of Territorial Army and Royal Naval personnel.

A need for futher limited support from the reserve forces has now arisen. The requirement is for a small number of officers to serve in Italy in intelligence and public relations capacities in support of the operations to enforce the no-fly zone over Bosnia. Three officers will be deployed at any one time and additional support may be needed in the United Kingdom. They will all be volunteers. They are being called out under section 11(1) of the Reserve Forces Act 1980.

TRANSPORT

Fords

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fords there are in England where public roads cross watercourses; how many fatal or serious accidents have occurred in each of the last 10 years as a result of vehicles failing to negotiate water on fords on public roads; if he will list fords which have been closed to traffic following such accidents; and what is his Department's policy towards fords and the provision of warning to motorists when water conditions may be dangerous.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No information is available centrally about the number of fords in England, accidents at or near fords, or fords which have been closed to traffic following accidents. Fords are normally on minor roads which are the responsibility of the local authority. The signs prescribed in Traffic Signs Regulations for use as necessary include triangular signs to give advance warning of the ford and the need to try brakes after crossing, gauges to show the depth of water and "Unsuitable for motors" plates for use with the warning signs where the water is normally too deep. Warning signs can be used where floods occur at fairly regular intervals but should be covered or removed unless the hazard is present.

Sonic Booms

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many sonic booms have been reported over land areas of the United Kingdom in each year since 1987; and how many of these were caused by (a) military aircraft and (b) civil aircraft.

Mr. Norris: We have received no reports of primary sonic booms over the UK from the operation of civil aircraft since 1987.

I have asked my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence to write to the hon. Member about military aircraft.

Exeter-Barnstaple Rail Line

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the future funding of the Exeter to Barnstaple railway line.

Mr. Freeman: Services which meet an essential social need will continue to receive a subsidy where necessary. This applies whether the operator is a franchisee or BR, which will continue to operate services until they are franchised.

Plutonium Transport

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter dated 15 March by the Minister for Aviation and Shipping to Lord Jenkins of Putney on comparative risks of plutonium transport.

Mr. Norris: Yes, I have done so.

General Lighthouse Fund

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what change will be made in the funding of the general lighthouse fund following the transfer of responsibility for this service from Her Majesty's Customs.

Mr. Norris: The General Lighthouse Authorities, with the agreement of the Department of Transport, have entered into a contract with the Institute of Chartered Shipbrokers to collect the majority of light dues. The contract came into operation of 1 April 1993 and did not involve any changes to the operation of the General Lighthouse Fund.

Bus Subsidies

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the total amount of subsidy to bus operations in each of the past 20 years.

Mr Freeman: The information requested is shown in the table. Revenue support figures for the years prior to 1977-78 are not shown as they could be produced only at disproportionate cost.

Road Crashes

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress in the reduction of deaths and serious injuries from road crashes in the north west region.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The number of people killed and seriously injured on north west roads in 1991 was 5,580. This is 21 per cent. lower than the annual average 1981-85 base figure, against which we are measuring our target of reducing the number of road casualties by one-third by the year 2000.

Roadworks

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport to what extent the application of higher safety standards to protect workers engaged in highway repairs has increased the number and length of lane closures at roadworks (a) generally, and (b) between junction 28 and 29 on the M1.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The current standards for safety zones have been in force for many years, although compliance may have improved following publication of the revised chapter 8 of the Department's traffic signs manual in May 1991. The number and length of lane closures have depended on the maintenance requirements at any particular time, and the volume of traffic which had to be accommodated in the open lanes.

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps his Department take where motorway repairs and improvements are done under lane rental contracts to prevent excessive delays caused by long sections of road being affected at any one time.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Lane rental provides a particular incentive for contractors to minimise the duration of lane closures, but all our motorway repairs and improvements are carefully planned and co-ordinated to minimise delays to road users, regardless of the form of contract used. We normally require that roadworks on motorways be spaced at least 10 km apart, and our contractors are instructed that no more than 4 km of carriageway should be coned off on any scheme at any time. Traffic management layouts are individually designed, and techniques continuously refined, to maximise the capacity of the lanes available and smooth the flow of traffic through the works.

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement concerning the length of delays to traffic at the roadworks between junctions 28 and 29 on the M1 motorway currently taking place; and what steps can be taken to reduce them.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Major maintenance, including strengthening and resurfacing, is necessary to the M1 between junctions 28 and 29 in Derbyshire. Lane restrictions are an essential safety measure to protect the workforce and road users. This section of the M1 carries 90,000 vehicles a day. With that level of traffic, lane restrictions will unfortunately cause a degree of disruption, particularly at peak times. To mitigate the effect on traffic, the work is being carried out under a lane rental contract which allows the contractor to work throughout the day and night, seven days a week, to encourage early completion. Through the national and local media road users have been kept advised of the work, so that they can consider making alternative arrangements if that is possible. I am, of course, sorry for the inconvenience that has been caused to people using this part of the M1, but the work is programmed for completion on 20 May.

Environmental Impact

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he plans to introduce on the environmental impact of transport in the north west region.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: All major transport infrastructure proposals, in the north-west and elsewhere, are subject to full environmental impact assessment.

The March Budget announced that the value of fuel duty in real terms is to be increased as part of a strategy to increase fuel efficiency and reduce CO2 emissions. My Department is working closely with our European partners to tighten standards for noise and gaseous emissions from vehicles.

Traffic, Greater Manchester

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will visit the Greater Manchester area to assess the effect of traffic on town centres.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I shall be happy to visit Greater Manchester when the opportunity arises.

We have several major schemes in our trunk road programme which are designed to take traffic away from town centres in Greater Manchester. We are also supporting local authority road schemes and public transport projects such as Metrolink to help traffic conditions in the centres.

Bus Travelcards

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport in how many urban areas all bus travelcard systems have been withdrawn or disagreed by operators since 1985.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not collected centrally. However, in all the major metropolitan areas there are at present travelcard schemes involving all the major bus operators.

LGV and PSV Drivers

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now make it his policy to initiate a registration scheme for qualified and experienced LGV and PSV instructors at an early date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 17 November 1992, Official Report, column 161.

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the standards of tuition given by unqualified LGV and PSV instructors and the numbers of liquidations of firms of unqualified instructors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have received no recent representations on these particular topics. My Department has no information about the number of liquidations of large goods vehicle and passenger carrying vehicle instruction firms.

Rail Privatisation

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) pursuant to his statement on 2 February, Official Report, column 243, that under the proposed rail franchising arrangement there should be a cap for those services that are a monopoly, at what level above the existing fares the cap will be set; and what the criteria will be for bringing the cap into effect;

(2) to what extent his policy on the guidance he will be issuing to the rail franchising authority as to the circumstances in which, and the extent to which, fares might be controlled has been developed beyond what is said in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the Railways Bill Committee paper No. 3 of February; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Further work remains to be done in developing the draft guidance that I provided to the Standing Committee in relation to fares regulation and other matters.

Emergency Telephone (A2)

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement on his plans to instal emergency telephones on the A2 as it passes through the Dartford constituency.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: Emergency telephones are to be installed on the A2 between Bexley and Three Crutches (M2). Consultants were appointed in January this year and it is hoped that installation work will start in spring next year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits Agency

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what targets for performance set by his Department for the Benefits Agency in respect of clearance time and accuracy are reduced for 1993-94 relative to the original targets for 1992-93; what are the estimated final figures for 1992-93; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: There are four targets which have been reduced for 1993-94.

	1992-93 per cent.	1993-94 per cent.
DLA clearance time (in 55 days)	95	85
DWA clearance time (in 5 days)	95	65
IS accuracy	94	92
Family credit accuracy	94	92

The final performance figures for 1992-93 will be published in the Benefits Agency annual report in July 1993. The 1993-94 targets will be reviewed, as is customary, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the light of those figures.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost to the Exchequer to date of weekend working by staff of the Benefits Agency during the past 18 months at time-and-a-half and double-time, plus travelling expenses, for the purpose of making-up the backlog of disability living allowance cases.

Mr. Scott: The administration of disability living allowance is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Gerald Kaufman, dated 4 May 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to the points raised in your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what is the total cost to the Exchequer to date of weekend working by staff of the Benefits Agency during the past 18 months at time-and-a-half and double-time, plus travelling expenses, for the purpose of making-up the backlog of Disability Living Allowance cases.

Firstly, it may be helpful for me to explain that Disability Living Allowance (DLA) was introduced on 3 February 1992 and due to this fact any overtime worked prior to this date was mainly in respect of project work and not directly related to processing claims. The information I have therefore supplied, is relevant to the period when DLA was introduced.

It is not possible to establish how much overtime has been paid in respect of weekend working as the information is not recorded separately from normal after hours working. However, the total amount of overtime, including travelling time, in the period February 1992 to February 1993 was £6,822,583. This figure also includes work carried out in the Disability Benefit Centres which is attributable to other work areas and cannot be identified separately, for example Attendance Allowance.

Turning now to the question of travelling expenses this data is not available as it is not recorded separately from the normal travelling expenses incurred during everyday duties.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report. A copy will also be placed in the Library.

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total cost to the Exchequer to date of providing staff of the Benefits Agency with corporate clothing; what this corporate clothing consists of; and how many sets of such clothing have been provided to date.

Mr. Burt: The provision of corporate clothing to Benefits Agency staff is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Gerald Kaufman, dated 4 May 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what is the total cost to the Exchequer to date of providing staff of the Benefits Agency with corporate clothing; what this corporate clothing consists of; and how many sets of such clothing have been provided to date.

Corporate clothing, as part of the customer service initiative, enables Benefits Agency staff to present a better and more professional image to their customers. This clothing is worn, voluntarily, by staff who deal regularly with the public such as receptionists, Social Fund officers and those members of staff running exhibitions and talks for outside bodies.

The corporate dress contract was awarded on 11 December 1991. The national cost of corporate clothing, for the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93, is in the region of £2·1 million. I should explain that funding for this clothing comes from office running costs and not out of the budgets allocated to benefits.

The items available as corporate clothing include jackets, shirts, blouses, cardigans, jumpers, trousers, ties, maternity dresses, and belts. The clothing does not come in sets, but the average order would be in the range of 10 items. Over 86,000 individual items have been ordered to date.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Pension Age

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update table 6, at page 49 of "Options for Equality in State Pension Age" to reflect current retirement pension rates.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is in the table. As in table 6 of "Options for Equality in State Pension Age", the amounts are rounded to the nearest £1.

Water Prices

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to take into account disparities between water prices in different regions of the United Kingdom when structuring the benefits system.

Mr. Burt: Social security in the United Kingdom is composed largely of national benefits. We have no plans to change this arrangement.

Pensions

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the cost that would be involved in extending inflation-proofed pensions to those over 80 years of age who do not qualify for annual uprating, assuming the same age profile for such British state retirement pensioners as for those who do.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimates he has made of the numbers of British state retirement pensioners with ancestral links with new Commonwealth countries who would wish to spend their retirement in a new Commonwealth country if their entitlement to an inflation-proofed state retirement pensions were to be maintained.

Miss Widdecombe: The nationality or origin of a contributor to the British national insurance scheme is not recorded and we do not, therefore, have the information needed to make such an estimate.

Mr. Churchill: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those countries where British pensioners receive inflation-proofed state retirement pensions together with the dates when, in each case reciprocal agreements were entered into.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is in the table.

Annual pension increases are also payable in Greece under the European Community's Social Security regulations.

[1]The reciprocal agreement between the United Kingdom and Denmark does not provide for annual pension increases to be paid to pensioners in Denmark but such increases are payable under the European Community's Social Security regulations.

Agencies (Letters)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 30 March, Official Report, column 172, for what purpose copies of letters from chief executives of agencies within his responsibility are sent to Ministers before being sent to the hon. Members to whom they are addressed; and how many such letters have been amended as a result of this practice.

Miss Widdecombe: Replying to parliamentary questions concerning day-to-day operational matters for which they are responsible has been delegated to the chief executive of this Department's Agencies in line with the Government's response to the Eighth Report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee (October 1990, Cm 1263). The arrangements are kept under review. In this Department Ministers see a draft of chief executives' replies to remain informed of the actions and replies of the agencies concerned. It is not the practice of Ministers to amend such drafts.

Free Envelopes

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's policy regarding the supply of free envelopes to facilitate claims for benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The supply of free envelopes is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. David Hanson, dated 5 May 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what is his Department's policy regarding the supply of free envelopes to facilitate claims for benefits.

In line with the Benefits Agency's core value of Customer Service it is normal practice for officers to provide pre-paid envelopes when requesting information from a customer.

I am aware that there have been isolated instances where the facility of free envelopes has been withdrawn at a local level, but this has only been where it was felt that the money could be used more constructively in providing a better standard of service to our customers. Such decisions are only made where the District Manager is satisfied that the service to the customer will not suffer, and the decision is kept under constant review. I am currently reviewing these exceptions with a view to deciding whether they are justified. I will make a decision and write to you further at that time.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Residential and Community Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will ensure that, where there is no opposition from clients, the Benefits Agency provides assessment information to local authority social services departments, for the purposes of establishing residential care charges;

(2) what guidance he has issued to ensure co-operation between Benefits Agency staff and social services departments for the introduction of community care.

Mr. Burt: The administration of social security benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 4 May 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking (i) if he will ensure that, where there is no opposition from clients, the Benefits Agency provides assessment information to local authority social services departments, for the purposes of establishing residential care charges and (ii) what guidance has been issued to ensure co-operation between Benefits Agency staff and social services departments, for the introduction of community care.

The Benefits Agency has made a number of arrangements to ensure adequate liaison with social services departments. The Departments of Health and of Social Security, the Benefits Agency and the Local Authority Associations (who represent all local authorities), have all been fully involved in the discussions on the introduction of community care. A joint statement of intent was issued in March 1993 to all Benefits Agency offices and Social Services departments (Social Work departments in Scotland). This detailed a number of good liaison practises and stressed the importance of effective communication.

Additionally, guidance has been issued nationally instructing staff in Benefits Agency offices to co-operate with all reasonable requests for information which social services departments may make, provided that the customers' consent has been obtained. Each Benefits Agency District has also appointed a member of staff with responsibility for liaising with their local Social Services or Social Work department.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

SCOTLAND

Borders Structure Plan

16. Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be able to make a statement following his consultations on the draft borders structure plan.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend will announce his conclusions on the borders structure plan as soon as he has fully considered all the objections to his draft modifications.

Public Expenditure

17. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the level of public expenditure per head in Scotland in the current year.

Mr. Stewart: Latest available figures for public expenditure per head in Scotland relate to 1991-92. In that year the level of identifiable general government expenditure per head in Scotland was £3,506. Identifiable general government expenditure comprises expenditure identified as being of direct benefit to Scottish inhabitants. Other expenditure, principally on defence, is of equal benefit to all the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. That amounted to £716 per head across the United Kingdom in 1991-92.

Water Investment

18. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much additional borrowing is planned to be required for water investment over the next three years under existing financing arrangements.

Sir Hector Monro: Control of local authority capital investment is exercised over expenditure rather than borrowing. Expenditure provision for water and sewerage is £237 million in 1993-94, £243 million in 1994-95, and £248 million in 1995-96, a total of £728 million.

Local Enterprise Companies

19. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairs of local enterprise companies to discuss their business plans.

Mr. Stewart: The contractual relationship to which business plans are relevant is between local enterprise companies and Scottish Enterprise or Highlands and Islands Enterprise. Consequently, although my right hon. Friend and I meet chairmen of local enterprise companies from time to time to discuss a range of economic development and training issues, our discussions are not specifically related to their business plans.

Farmed Salmon

20. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for regulating the production of farmed salmon in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: I have welcomed the salmon farming industry's proposals to establish producer organisations. These will help create a more stable and better informed market. However, I do not accept the industry's case for giving such organisations compulsory powers to determine stock levels and minimum prices both for members and non-members.

Reservoirs (Public Access)

21. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on public access to reservoirs for recreational purposes.

Sir Hector Monro: Public access to reservoirs for recreational purposes is a matter for regional and islands councils as water authorities. The Scottish Office Environment Department will shortly be publishing a voluntary code of practice on conservation, access and recreation to guide the work of water authorities and river purification boards, prepared with their full co-operation.

Hospital Treatments

22. Mr. Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) in-patients and (b) out-patients were treated in national health service hospitals in Scotland in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what the figures were in 1979.

Mr. Stewart: A total of 933,624 patients were treated as in-patients in national health service hospitals in Scotland in the year ending 30 September 1992 compared with 735,583 in 1979—a 27 per cent. increase. Out-patients rose to 6,013,929 in 1992 from 5,202,863 in 1979. The most significant increase occurred in the numbers of patients treated as day cases—up to 229,222 in 1992 a 180 per cent. increase on the 81,577 recorded in 1979.

Hospitals (Glasgow)

23. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with Greater Glasgow health board regarding the future of Glasgow hospitals, particularly Stobhill hospital.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had no recent discussions with Greater Glasgow health board regarding their comprehensive review of acute and maternity services. He looks forward to receiving the board's detailed proposals in due course.

Dutch Elm Disease

24. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking to prevent the spread of Dutch elm disease.

Sir Hector Monro: Dutch elm disease has already spread throughout Britain, apart from some parts of north Scotland. Legislation has been in place for many years giving local authorities powers to order the felling of diseased trees in certain areas where this would help to contain the disease. The Forestry Commission is continuing to investigate possible control methods, including a virus that attacks the fungus which causes the disease. It is also working on the development of disease resistant strains of English elm.

Water Privatisation

25. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the corresponding provisions in Northern Ireland when considering whether to privatise Scottish Water.

Sir Hector Monro: My right hon. Friend and I maintain contact as appropriate with our colleagues in the Northern Ireland Office.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has had from Conservative councillors on water privatisation.

Sir Hector Monro: My right hon. Friend has received 14 representations from Conservative councillors on the future structure of water and sewerage services in Scotland since 17 November last year.

Structural Funds

26. Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has held with EC counterparts on structural funds' allocation (a) in general and (b) on objective 5(b) status for areas within Grampian regional council boundaries.

Mr. Stewart: Draft regulations have been published by the Commission and are under discussion in the structural actions working group of the Council of Ministers. Until the negotiations on criteria for the selection of objective 5(b) areas are further advanced it would be premature to discuss possible financial allocations to areas bidding for inclusion.

Crash Barriers

28. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many miles of motorway and dual carriageway in Scotland do not have crash barriers installed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are 19 miles of motorway and 106 miles of trunk road dual carriageway in Scotland without central reserve safety fencing. This represents approximately 10 per cent. of motorways and 33 per cent. of trunk road dual carriageways. A rolling programme is underway to install central reserve safety fencing on these remaining sections of the network by the end of the 1994-95 financial year.

Records are not kept centrally for non-trunk road dual carriageways, for which regional councils are responsible.

Rail Transport (Fife)

29. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the future of rail transport in Fife.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Responsibility for the railways throughout Great Britain is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. The provision of rail services in Fife is at present a matter for British Rail. Under the Government's proposals for the railways we believe that the direct involvement of the private sector will result in a better, more responsive service for the travelling public throughout Scotland including Fife.

Local Government Reform

27. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the Government's proposed time scale for introducing local government reform.

Mr. Stewart: We intend to announce our decisions on the future structure of local government in Scotland in a White Paper before the summer recess. Thereafter, subject to the necessary legislation being put in place, elections to shadow authorities will take place in spring 1995, with new authorities assuming full control on 1 April 1996.

30. Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now make a further statement on the reform of Scottish local government.

Mr. Stewart: More than 3,300 responses to the consultation exercise on local government reform were received from a wide range of organisations and individuals. These are currently being analysed and we intend to announce our decisions on the future structure of local government in Scotland in a White Paper before the summer recess.

38. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his latest estimate of the cost of local government reorganisation.

Mr. Stewart: A move to a single-tier structure will give rise to transitional costs which should be quickly recovered by annual savings. An indication of the likely financial consequences of reform will be included in a White Paper on our restructuring proposals which we intend to publish before the summer recess.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to hold discussions regarding the cost of the reform of the Scottish local government system prior to the publication of the White Paper on this subject.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend will be consulting colleagues in the usual way before publishing his proposals for the reform of local government in Scotland.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his oral answer of 31 March, Official Report, column 349, on the cost of local Government reform, if he will hold discussions on the costs of reform with existing local authorities.

Mr. Stewart: My officials have already held useful discussions on the costs of reform with local authority representatives on the working party on local government finance. I have no plans at present to hold further discussions on the issue.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the names and qualifications of financial and management consultancies he intends to use to help the Scottish Office formulate the financial data required to produce a White Paper on Scottish local government reform;

(2) what plans he has to invite Touche Ross to tender for further work with the Scottish Office in connection with the reform of the local Government system in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: The Scottish Office has no plans at present to commission further work from any consultants in connection with local government reform.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy, before publication of the White Paper on the reform of local Government in Scotland, to have discussions with representatives of industry and commerce in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: My colleagues and I meet regularly with representatives of industry and commerce in Scotland to discuss a range of current issues, including local government reform. Our consultation paper on local government reform generated about 220 responses from commercial and industrial organisations and these will be taken fully into account before decisions are reached on the new structure.

Museums

31. Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on policy concerning museums.

Sir Hector Monro: Policy on museums in Scotland is developed and reviewed in consultation with interested organisations. In particular with the Museums and Galleries Commission, the Scottish Museums Council, and representatives of local authorities.

Ministry of Defence Spending

32. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the success of Scottish Enterprise in ensuring that Ministry of Defence spending is attracted to Scotland, Glasgow and Govan.

Mr. Stewart: Scottish Enterprise's success in helping Scottish companies to respond to opportunities to secure contracts and in attracting new employment to Scotland is assessed in the round rather than in relation to any specific organisation. Scottish Enterprise's specific initiative to deal with the effects on the Scottish economy and labour market of changes in the defence sector also goes wider than seeking to maximise Ministry of Defence spending in Scotland; and assessment of that initiative is framed in appropriately broad terms to reflect its objectives.

Unemployment

33. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of unemployment in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: In March 1993, the level of unemployment in Scotland, seasonally adjusted, was 244,400 or 9·6 per cent. of the work force.

It is very encouraging that unemployment in Scotland has fallen for two successive months.

Hospital Building

34. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much capital expenditure has been allocated for the current year and 1994 for new hospital building projects in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: A total of £180·484 million was allocated for capital expenditure to health boards, trusts and the state hospital for 1993-94. This figure excludes moneys for information technology but includes amounts allocated for equipment and for the improvement of the existing estate. The allocations for financial year 1994-95 will only be decided at the end of the calendar year.

Student Grants

35. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Scottish Education Department will reconsider funding for courses affected by the change of status from college to university of certain institutions in Scotland in cases where students have been deprived of grants.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In Scotland, responsiblity for the provision of student support is determined by the nature, level, and validation of the course concerned; not by the status of the institution offering it.

My right hon. Friend has no plans to change that arrangement.

Sunday Trading

36. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what conclusions he has drawn from experience of the practice of Sunday trading in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Over the years Sunday trading practices in Scotland have evolved in line with the wishes of the local communities. Sunday trading in Scotland occurs mainly in urban areas. It fulfils a need for some members of the public without seriously disadvantaging others. The present arrangements appear to work well and to the satisfaction of the great majority of the Scottish public.

New Towns

37. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairmen of the Scottish new towns to discuss the future of the new towns; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend and I met the chairmen and deputy chairmen of all the new town development corporations on 5 October 1992. I again met the chairmen collectively on 21 December 1992 and will meet the chairmen and board members of individual corporations during the summer months.

West Coast Main Line

39. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the chairman of British Rail concerning new investment on the west coast main line; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend meets the chairman of British Rail from time to time. Such contacts cover a wide range of topics relating to rail services in Scotland.

Local Enterprise Companies

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the 1993-94 budget for each local enterprise company in Scotland.

Mr. Stewart: The allocation of resources to the local enterprise companies is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have asked the chairmen of these bodies to write to the hon. Member.

Lothian and Edinburgh Enterprise Ltd.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money was given to Lothian and Edinburgh Enterprise Ltd. for training in (a) 1992-93 and (b) 1993-94.

Mr. Stewart: The allocation of resources to the local enterprise companies is an operational matter for Scottish Enterprise. I have asked the chairman of Scottish Enterprise to write to the hon. Member.

Opencast Coal

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will issue new interim guidance on opencast coal production, following the Bridgecastle case, to update circulars 4/1984 and 23/1987;

(2) at what stage he proposes to issue interim guidance on opencast coal production to supersede circulars 4/1984 and 23/1987.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 4 May 1993]: We do not propose to issue specific interim guidance on opencast coal production. We do, however, propose to issue a new National Planning Policy Guideline "Land for Mineral Working" later this year. This will embrace opencast coal mining, take account of the Coal Review White Paper, and supersede circulars 4/1984 and 23/1987.

TRANSPORT

Road Schemes

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the report into speeding up pre-construction procedures for road schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: My right hon. Friend is concerned to speed up the delivery of schemes in the national road programme. He will make a statement about his plans as soon as possible.

Road Salt

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ban the use of sodium hexacyanoferrate in road salt.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The rock salt used on the Department's motorways and trunk roads complies with British standard 3247, which stipulates the use of an anti-caking agent. The anti-caking agent currently in use is sodium hexacyanoferrate and I have no plans to discontinue its use.

Seacroft-Crossgates Bypass

Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy that any decision on the Leeds A6120 Seacroft/Crossgates bypass should be postponed until a decision has been taken on the transpennine strategy study.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The transpennine study addresses wide strategic problems on the road network across the Pennines, whereas any proposals to improve the A6120 running through the communities of Seacroft and Crossgates would be designed to overcome existing traffic congestion and the bad accident record on the present road. It would be wrong therefore to tie the urgently needed improvements on the A6120 to the different and longer-term prospects for the transpennine routes.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what licences have been granted or issued for the transportation of radioactive materials to the THORP site since 1 January; and what applications are now under consideration by his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: One package design approval has been issued: four others are under consideration.

Nuclear Weapons (Transport)

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make public his secret emergency plans dealing with nuclear weapon transport accidents.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I have no such plans. This is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Traffic Review, Meriden

Mr. Mills: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will commission a review of traffic through Meriden village since the closure of the Oak Lane junction with the A45; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: We are undertaking a review of all the options for permanent improvement of the Oak Lane junction with the A45. This will take account of the present interim scheme and of local views. I will write to my hon. Friend when the review is complete.

Seat Belts (Buses)

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce compulsory seat belts for school buses and minibuses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: There is presently no requirement to fit seat belts in the rear seats of minibuses and coaches except in the exposed forward facing seats in coaches first used after 1 October 1988. We are pressing the European Commission to put forward amendments to the relevant directives to require seat belts to be fitted to all seats in these vehicles. The present law on compulsory wearing of seat belts requires them to be used in rear, as well as front, seats of smaller minibuses with an unladen weight not exceeding 2540kg, where they are fitted voluntarily.

"The Loading Gauge Issue"

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he received the Eurotunnel-sponsored report entitled "The Loading Gauge Issue" published in January; what reply he has made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I received Eurotunnel's report directly it was published. Eurotunnel is involved in continuing discussions being held between my Department, Her Majesty's railways inspectorate, independent consultants and British Rail on the feasibility and costs of upgrading some of BR's existing lines to a gauge suitable for piggyback transport.

Plutonium Nitrate

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will request the safety and reliability directorate of AEA Technology to update the 1984 report SRD-R-244, on the radiological consequences of the release into the sea of the contents of a plutonium nitrate package.

Mr. Norris: I understand that the Atomic Energy Authority is reviewing the report.

MOD Vehicles (Licensing)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many vehicle types have been licensed by his Department under the International Atomic Energy Agency safety series No. 6 regulations 1985, as amended in 1990, for use by the Ministry of Defence for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: No such licences are required.

Night Flights

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish a list of those airlines, airport owner/operators, local authorities, pressure groups and other similar organisations and bodies that have submitted observations on his proposals for new night flight controls at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports;

(2) how many representations he has received from members of the public on his proposals for new night flight controls at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports.

Mr. Norris: The numbers of responses received in the relevant division to date is as follows:—

17	Members of Parliament and MEPs (other than letters covering constituents' views);
3	Airport consultative committees
66	Local authorities, Parish and Town councils, and local authority organisations;
41	Environmental and other local groups;
2	Aviation and acoustical consultants
61	Airlines;
5	Airport and aviation bodies;
17	Airline and airport users;
1,823+	Responses from people living around Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted;
83	Responses from people living elsewhere;
2,762*	Petitions and signatures lodged in bulk.

\+ Relates to number of letters, not number of signatures.
* Numbers subject to verification.

Figures exclude correspondence related to proposed aircraft noise classifications. A list of the main respondents will be made available in due course.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will publish a list of those Governments with whom discussions have been held on the new aircraft type classification proposed in his consultation paper on new night flight controls at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports; and how many of such Governments have indicated their support;

(2) if he will make a statement on the outcome of the discussions with the United States Federal Aviation Authority on their willingness to accept the new aircraft type classification system proposed in his consultation paper on new night flight controls at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports.

Mr. Norris: The classification system is based on the noise certification data which all modern aircraft are required to possess to operate between states that are signatories of the Chicago convention. As stated in the consultation paper, the use of such data is being discussed with several European countries with the hope of evolving a common approach. These discussions are being conducted through regular contacts at normal aviation fora. The outcome of our present consultation in relation to Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted is not dependent on the outcome of these discussions.

Safe Seas

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what response he has made to the European Commission on its proposal for setting up a committee on safe seas contained in the communication from Commissioners on "A Common Policy on Safe Seas"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The United Kingdom has warmly welcomed the Commission's communication "A Common Policy for Safe Seas", which closely mirrors the Government's views on the need for action to improve the level of maritime safety in Community waters. Along with other member states, we approve in principle the Commission's proposal for a committee on safe seas, and are currently considering what its terms of reference should be.

ENVIRONMENT

Revocation Orders

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total number of revocation orders issued by his Department following inappropriate planning decisions by local authorities in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Baldry: This power has been used only once in the last 10 years. The last occasion was in 1991.

Integrated Administration and Control Scheme

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for the Director General of Ordnance Survey to ensure (a) that all areas of United Kingdom farmland are mapped and (b) the establishment of an emergency Ordnance Survey telephone helpline to assist farmers experiencing mapping difficulties in completing their IACS forms.

Mr. Baldry: Ordnance Survey has surveyed and mapped all mountain and moorland areas of Great Britain at a scale of 1:10,000 and all other rural areas at a scale of 1:2,500. This mapping, which is based on the national grid and is available in a variety of forms, is maintained by Ordnance Survey, but is not commercially viable to revive the map of rural and remote areas as intensively as those of urban areas.

Some 400 outlets have been set up by Ordnance Survey to help farmers obtain the necessary maps and information to complete their IACS forms; these include Ordnance Surveys superplan agents, land agents who have been granted extended copyright licences for the purpose, Ordnance Survey's own field offices, the Welsh Office and ADAS in Wales and the Scottish agricultural college in Scotland. In addition, staff at Ordnance Survey headquarters in Southampton are answering over 200 telephone inquiries from farmers each day using sophisticated helpline facilities.

Timeshare

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how United Kingdom timeshare dwellings are to be treated for the purposes of council tax and business rates regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: Timeshare accommodation is liable for non-domestic rates.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to amend the status of timeshare dwellings to make them eligible for council tax and to remove them from business rates.

Mr. Robin Squire: None.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) of 28 April, Official Report, column 947, whether he will consider moving his Department to the Ark in Hammersmith.

Mr. Howard: I have asked Property Holdings, who are property managers for the Government estate, for advice on suitable accommodation. They are already fully aware of the availability of the Ark development and will take it into account.

Tyne and Wear Urban Development Corporation

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), Official Report, column 319, how many of the jobs created by the Tyne and Wear urban development corporation were relocations from other sites; how many of the jobs are being carried out by people living (a) within the urban development corporation area and (b) within two miles of the urban development corporation area; and what has been the total amount spent by the Tyne and Wear urban development corporation since its inception.

Mr. Robin Squire: Information as requested relating to jobs created by the Tyne and Wear urban development corporation is not available. The corporation does, however, in conjunction with the local training and enterprise councils, encourage employers to recruit people from the local community.

The total amount spent by the corporation to 31 March 1993, including receipts, was £212·17 million.

Chemical Industry

Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the process definitions set out in the Environmental Protection (Prescribed Processes and Substances) Regulations 1991 as they apply to the chemical industry.

Mr. Maclean: I met representatives of the Chemical Industries Association on 24 February to discuss the industry's concern that the process definitions set out in the Environmental Protection (Prescribed Processes and Substances) Regulations 1991 do not adequately reflect the complexity of the chemical industry. The industry believes that problems of process definition will result in unreasonable uncertainty and excessive cost for the industry in applying for authorisations under integrated pollution control and will delay the authorisation process.

At the meeting, I promised the industry that we would consider sympathetically the details of their concerns and take measures to overcome them. Since then, a small working party comprising representatives of the industry and of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has been looking into this problem.

Companies within this sector are due to be brought within integrated pollution control this year; the window for applications for authorisation of such process runs from 1 May to 31 July. In order to avoid the need for applications to be submitted before the detailed outcome of these considerations is known, I propose to extend the application window until 31 October. Amending regulations to that effect will be laid in the very near future.

I am satisfied that extending the application window in this way will not lead to any weakening in environmental protection, and believe that the operation of integrated pollution control can be improved by making limited changes to the definition of processes in the manufacture and use of organic chemicals falling under section 4.2 of chapter 4 of the regulations. These changes are not expected to affect other industrial sectors or processes subject to local authority air pollution control or to cut across possible changes that may arise from the wider consultation we are currently undertaking in relation to the 1991 regulations.

Estate Action

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the percentage of the total housing investment programme and resources allocated to estate action in each year since 1986-87.

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 5 May 1993]: Under the local authority capital finance system established in 1990-91, housing investment programme allocations represent an assessment of the relative need for housing capital expenditure, rather than a direct borrowing approval. Borrowing approval is conveyed by the single, all-service basic credit approval, augmented by allocations of supplementary credit approvals, where appropriate. In turn, local authorities finance their housing investment programmes from credit approvals and grant, from usable capital receipts, and from contributions from revenue budgets.

The table shows the resources allocated to the estate action programme each year since 1986-87, in total and as a percentage of total local authority housing capital allocations.

	Estate action resources (£ million)	Estate action resources as a percentage of local authority housing capital allocations
1986-87	45	3
1987-88	75	5
1988-89	140	9
1989-90	190	13
1990-91	190	10
1991-92	268	13
1992-93	347	[1]18
1993-94	356	[2]20

Homelessness

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the choice provided by local authorities to homeless families when they are moved on from one unit of temporary accommodation to another type of temporary accommodation.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not held centrally.

Seveso Directive

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 26, April to the hon. and Learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), Official Report, column 322, if he will list the bodies and people who will receive copies of the consultation document on extending the scope of the Seveso directive.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

The proposed amending regulations to extend the scope of the Seveso directive will apply to only approximately 10 waste disposal installations in the United Kingdom. Consultation with the National Association of Waste Disposal Contractors has already begun. Further consultation will take place through the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on dangerous substances, which includes representatives from the CBI, TUC and local authority associations such as the Association of District Councils and Association of County Councils. Other interested bodies will be alerted through a press release which will advise how copies of the consultation document can be obtained.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Overseas Domestic Workers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to make provisions for overseas domestic workers to be granted leave to remain while they pursue legal action, civil or criminal, against former employers;

(2) what plans he has of giving overseas domestic workers an immigration status (a) independent of the household they work for and (b) as workers;

(3) what plans he has to establish a review of the present laws regulating the admission of overseas domestic workers; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what plans there are to allow overseas domestic workers to change employers within the same category of employment.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We introduced in May 1991 tighter criteria for the exceptional arrangements outside the immigration rules under which a domestic servant who has worked abroad for an employer who comes to the United Kingdom may be admitted to continue working for that employer. Although domestic workers are admitted to keep their jobs as part of the household of their employer, they have their own immigration status as employees and may apply for indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom after four years in approved employment under the exceptional arrangements. There are no provisions under those arrangements for domestic workers to change employers outside the immigration rules before being granted indefinite leave to remain. Nor is there provision for any non-EC national to remain in the United Kingdom after his or her leave has expired in order to pursue legal action. However, each case involving a domestic worker who wishes to remain in the United Kingdom after having left the employer for whom he or she was admitted to work is carefully considered before any enforcement action is taken, and account is taken of any compassionate circumstances. We have no plans to carry out a further review of the arrangements for domestic workers.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on how many overseas domestic workers have initiated legal challenges against their former employers since 24 July 1990 on grounds of (a) sexual offences, (b) offences of violence, (c) false imprisonment, (d) assault and battery, (e) intimidation, (f) breach of contract and (g) slavery; and how many such employers were found guilty.

Mr. Jack: The information requested is not recorded centrally.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received with regard to reforming the immigration status of overseas domestic workers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Since the beginning of this year, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have received four lettters from right hon. and hon. Members and noble Lords about the exceptional arrangements outside the immigration rules for domestic workers from overseas. My right hon. and learned Friend and I have also received a number of letters from members of the public and organisations.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many domestic workers have entered the United Kingdom since 1977; and if he will specify those entering under (a) code 4, (b) code 5N and (c) code 3 of the immigration regulations.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information is not available in the form requested. However, in the period January to August 1992, some 8,600 entry clearances were issued to domestic workers by the main posts which issue entry clearances to such workers.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the number of domestic workers deported since 1980; and how many were (a) overstayers or (b) unauthorised workers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Life Sentences

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the reconviction rate for people released from prison on licence who were serving life sentences.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Two per cent. of life licensees released between 1972 and 1988 were convicted of a "grave" offence—violent crime—within two years of discharge and 4 per cent. of those persons released between 1972 and 1985 were reconvicted within five years. The figures for a "standard list" offence—indictable plus certain summary offences—were 10 and 21 per cent respectively. This information was published in statistical bulletin 3/93, a copy of which is in the Library.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the Government's policy for financing and supporting crime prevention.

Mr. Jack: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) on 4 March, at columns 274-75, which details Home Office support for crime prevention. In addition, other Departments' programmes, such as the Department of the Environment's city challenge and estates action, and the Department for Education's grants for education support and training scheme, include strong crime prevention elements. Overall Government spending on crime prevention was an estimated £167 million in 1991-92.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the working so far of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We remain committed to the Act's objective of improving public protection against attacks from fighting and other dogs. We continue to keep the Act's operation under review, and to consider suggestions for further improvement to its practical operations.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to amend the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 to ensure that the distinction between pit bull terriers and Staffordshire bull terriers is clear.

Mr. Jack: We have no plans to amend the Act. Periodic advice has been issued to the enforcement authorities and the courts on the identification of dogs, and we are considering suggestions for providing further help on this point.

Identity Cards

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about a national identity card scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Some 27 individual letters have been received from Members of Parliament and others so far this year. None has persuaded me that the advantages of such a scheme outweigh the disadvantages.

Neighbourhood Watch

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support his Department gives to assist neighbourhood watch schemes.

Mr. Jack: The Government are committed to encouraging the development of neighbourhood watch schemes. The number of schemes has grown rapidly in recent years and there are now nearly 115,000 schemes in operation in England and Wales covering more than 5 million households.

We set up Crime Concern in 1988 to stimulate growth of schemes and develop a national structure for the neighbourhood watch movement. We have provided considerable financial backing to enable Crime Concern to carry forward this work.

We have recently given funding towards the cost of producing a neighbourhood watch co-ordinator's handbook which is shortly to be published. A number of national conferences for scheme co-ordinators have been arranged by Crime Concern. Last year's conference took place at the national exhibition centre in Birmingham and was addressed by the Home Secretary.

With financial support from the Home Office, Crime Concern is also undertaking a two year pilot project, the "neighbourhood safety project", to introduce a neighbourhood watch-type scheme into two high crime residential areas in West Yorkshire.

We are including a special neighbourhood watch insert in the Home Office magazine "Crime Prevention News" which is sent to all police crime prevention officers for distribution to neighbourhood watch co-ordinators.

We encourage the police to support neighbourhood watch schemes, although it is ultimately a matter for each chief constable to decide how much of his resources he can allocate to these activities. I addressed the Derby neighbourhood watch co-ordinators' conference on 30 April and I was delighted to learn about the considerable support which Derbyshire police are providing to schemes throughout the force area.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cambodia

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, Official Report, column 148, and his pursuant answer of 29 April column 506, what information he has on the number of mines lifted by the Cambodians trained or operating under UNTAC in Cambodia.

Mr. Goodlad: According to the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia—UNTAC—figures at mid-April, Cambodians trained by UNTAC have destroyed or recovered 14,343 mines and munitions in Cambodia—9,474 anti-personnel mines, 20 anti-tank mines and 4,869 pieces of unexploded ordinance. By comparison, non-governmental organisations have cleared 2,171 mines and munitions.

World Conflict

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretry of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the current armed conflicts in the world, the estimated number of deaths in each and the actions taken by the United Kingdom Government to encourage peace in each conflict.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Earlier this year the Secretary General of the United Nations, Dr. Boutros-Ghali, told my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs that the United Nations was currently seized of 25 conflicts around the world. Detailed information on all these conflicts is not centrally recorded and could be produced only at disproportionate cost. However, 12 of these conflicts are the object of a United Nations peacekeeping operation to which Britain as a permanent member of the Security Council makes its due contribution. They are: India/Pakistan, Lebanon, Israel/Syria and Jerusalem, Cyprus, Cambodia, former Yugoslavia, Iran/Kuwait, El Salvador, Western Sahara, Angola, Somalia and Mozambique.

Ukraine

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral answer of 14 April, to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), Official Report, column 830, if he will set out the reasons why Her Majesty's Government regard it as a disastrous mistake by the Ukranian Parliament to hold the view that the Ukraine should not relinquish the nuclear weapons held by Ukraine.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Under the Lisbon protocol to START I, Ukraine is committed to ratification of START I and early accession to the non-proliferation treaty as a non-nuclear weapons state. Fulfilment of these commitments will influence the extent to which co-operation and partnership between Ukraine and the west can be developed. A decision to retain nuclear weapons would jeopardise the implementation of START I, and thus START II, and would risk weakening the NPT. We believe it is in the interests of global security, and that of Ukraine, that the START reductions should be carried out and the NPT strengthened.

Subsidiarity

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what procedure he plans to adopt to review European Community legislation passed before December 1991 in relation into its compliance with the principles of subsidiarity laid down by the Maastricht treaty.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We attach great importance to the rigorous implementation of subsidiarity, both in relation to existing and proposed Community legislation. The Edinburgh European Council asked the Commission to present the outcome of its review of existing EC legislation to the Brussels European Council in December. We are discussing with EC partners and with the Commission which items of legislation should be repealed or amended on subsidiarity grounds.

Overseas Domestic Workers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of (a) overseas domestic workers and (b) their employers he estimates received his Department's "Information for Domestic Servants Travelling to the United Kingdom"; and whether the leaflets are written in the mother tongues of the intended recipients.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: All domestic workers are handed a copy of an information leaflet when interviewed at post for entry clearance, and all employers are given a leaflet together with an explanatory note. Records are not kept of the numbers of leaflets issued.

Leaflets are available in English and Arabic. Arrangements are in hand for a translation to be made available in Tagalog—Filipino. Where an applicant does not understand English the contents of the leaflet are explained in their local language. The Home Office is currently producing copies in Spanish, Bengali, Urdu, Hindi and Tamil.

South Georgia and South Sandwich Islands

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the extension of maritime jurisdiction around South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands.

Mr. Garel-Jones: In recent years, we have become increasingly concerned about the conservation of marine resources around South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands in the south Atlantic which is a British dependent territory. At present, the Crown's sovereignty and jurisdiction around South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands extend to the 12-mile limit of the territorial sea. For waters beyond this, we have hitherto relied solely on the work of the commission created by the Convention on the Conservation of Antarctic Marine Living Resources—CCAMLR—a component of the Antarctic treaty system. This depends on flag state regulation and policing to apply conservation measures decided by consensus amongst the 22 members. We fully support CCAMLR and co-operate in the body's work. We have worked most energetically to strengthen the role of CCAMLR in its regulation of southern ocean fisheries. Although CCAMLR has provided timely and much-needed protection for commercially fished species, we are concerned that nevertheless fish stocks have been depleted.

Moreover, infringements of CCAMLR regulations have grown. The need to reinforce conservation arrangements in the area for which Her Majesty's Government are responsible is clear. Accordingly, Ministers have decided to strengthen conservation and management of marine resources around South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands by the introduction of national measures. These measures are intended to supplement not replace the role of CCAMLR and are of course fully compatible with it.

For this reason, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has instructed the commissioner for South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands to issue a proclamation tomorrow to provide for the exercise of the Crown's sovereign rights to jurisdiction over a maritime zone and its natural resources, living and non-living, extending to a distance of 200 nautical miles around the territories.

In addition, an ordinance will be made, in due course, by the commissioner for South Georgia and the South Sandwich islands designed to monitor and protect the state of the fish stocks within the maritime zone. This action will reinforce existing measures under CCAMLR.

Since their re-establishment in 1990, our relations with Argentina have progressed to their present excellent state and are now marked by a new openness and growing mutual confidence. This is a source of great satisfaction to Her Majesty's Government, who will continue to work to develop the relationship further. Against this background, it was natural for us to discuss our concerns over conservation fully with the Argentine Government with whom we have extensive exchanges on south Atlantic matters, particularly in relation to fisheries. We look forward to pursuing this dialogue.

PRIME MINISTER

Appointments

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Prime Minister how many peers have been appointed to offices of profit under the Crown since 1979.

The Prime Minister: This information is not available.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 May.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

EDUCATION

Testing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of the advertisements his Department placed in the national press on 27 April promoting the national testing scheme; and what plans he has to publish further advertisements on testing in schools.

Mr. Forth: Information about the cost of the advertisements is commercial in confidence. Further advertising is planned in the national press until the end of the campaign in May which concludes with magazine advertisements.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Unemployment

12. Mr. McFall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his latest estimate is of the cost to the Exchequer of each unemployed person per year.

Sir John Cope: The Department of Social Security's annual report provides an estimate that, in the current year, a change in unemployment of 100,000 would result in a variation of £350 million in benefit expenditure or an average of £3,500 per unemployed person.

22. Ms Short: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to the Treasury in benefits paid and tax and national insurance payments forgone of the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Portillo: The Department of Social Security estimates that in 1993-94 the total cost of benefits paid to unemployed people will be £9·29 billion based on an unemployment assumption for Great Britain of 2¾ million. An estimate of tax and national insurance payments forgone is not produced, as it depends on the particular tax liabilities and earnings when in employment of each individual who is currently unemployed.

Recession

13. Dr. Berry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the steps he is taking to end the recession in Britain.

Mr. Nelson: Across the economy there are clear signs of a resumption of growth, reflecting our success in bringing down inflation. The Government's economic policies are designed to ensure that inflation is kept low and thereby support the recovery.

Industrial Production

15. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his assessment of the latest trend in the level of industrial production.

Mr. Portillo: The recent trend in industrial production has been upwards: in the three months to February the index of production was 1¼ per cent. up on a year earlier. And business surveys point to continuation of an upward trend.

European Bank of Reconstruction and Development

16. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he has taken to influence the policy of the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development.

Mr. Nelson: In his statement to the EBRD's annual meeting in London, on 27 April, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer emphasised the EBRD's duty to use taxpayers' resources as cost-effectively as possible. He stressed the need that the institution, which was established to promote efficiency and enterprise, should itself provide an example of sound financial management. Welcoming the changes agreed by the bank's board of directors to improve the control of its costs, my right hon. Friend argued for rapid and vigorous implementation of these. He also called for the bank to develop its key role in promoting effective mechanisms for assisting small and medium-sized enterprises in the countries of the former Communist bloc.

Cohesion Fund

17. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the total sum to be distributed from the EC's proposed cohesion fund between now and 1999; and what part of this sum is estimated to come to the United Kingdom.

Sir John Cope: The Edinburgh European Council agreed a figure of 15·15 billion ecu for the period; and that only Spain, Portugal, Ireland and Greece would be eligible.

Petroleum Revenue Tax

18. Mr. Welsh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the petroleum revenue tax changes announced in the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: Representations, including important support for the reform, have been received from a number of companies and individuals on the petroleum revenue tax changes.

Business Taxation

19. Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what impact his 1992 Budget changes to business taxation have had on employment levels.

Sir John Cope: The changes in business taxes in the 1992 Budget, together with those in the autumn statement and this year's March Budget have strengthened the prospects for sustainable growth of output and employment.

Investment and Unemployment

20. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the relationship between the Budget measures for investment and unemployment levels.

Mr. Portillo: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Ipswich on 1 April, at columns 371-72.

Mortgage Rates

21. Mr. Bates: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when mortgage rates were last at their current level.

Mr. Nelson: Following the most recent cut in base rates, most mortgage lenders have announced mortgage rates below 8 per cent. They are now at their lowest level since April 1969.

Retail Sales

23. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when retail sales were last at their latest reported level.

Mr. Nelson: Retail sales in the first quarter of this year were at their highest level ever recorded.

Trade Balance

24. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to monitor the United Kingdom's balance of trade in the absence of official statistics.

Mr. Portillo: Statistics for the United Kingdom's trade with countries outside the EC have continued without interruption. Figures for our trade with all countries in the first quarter of 1993 will be published in the usual balance of payments released in June.

Domestic Fuel

25. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further plans he has to alleviate the effect on those on low incomes of charging VAT on domestic fuel.

Sir John Cope: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made clear in his Budget speech, extra help will be given from April 1994 to poorer pensioners and others receiving income-related benefits. The precise amount and the way in which this will be targeted will be announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security in the autumn.

Sudan

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on relations between Sudan and (a) the International Monetary Fund and (b) the World bank.

Mr. Nelson: The IMF is not providing any financial assistance to the Sudan which is in arrears to that institution. The World bank has provided one loan, for an emergency drought recovery project, since 1990; the bank has no current plans to make further loans.

GP Fund Holders

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what differences there are in taxation of the various functions, services and purchases between those of a general practioner fund-holding practice and those of a non-fund-holding practice.

Mr. Dorrell: As far as VAT is concerned, there is no difference. For their NHS activities, both are considered to be part of the VAT registration of the regional health authority, and are treated equally. The position for trading income is that the same general rules on the taxation of trading profits apply whether or not the income of a general practitioner practice includes amounts allocated under the funding initiative.

Public Servants

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, 292-94, if he will list the numbers and staff costs to the Exchequer of each central Government Department by civil service grade for 1979-80 and 1991-92; and what comparable information he has for local authorities.

Mr. Portillo: Information is not available centrally about the staff costs to the Exchequer of each central Government Department by civil service grade or about the staff grading or staff costs of local authorities.

Information on numbers of non-industrial staff in post in the major departments, broken down by selected occupational groups and grades, is given in the annual publication "Civil Service Statistics" which is available from the Library. The 1991 and 1992 editions provide staffing information for 1 April 1991 and 1 April 1992 respectively. A breakdown by grade only is published in the 1979 and 1980 editions.

EC Payments

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what additional payments were made from the Consolidated Fund to the EC as part of the United Kingdom's total payments to the EC due to the increased VAT incurred as a result of contracting out in each year since 1982.

Sir John Cope: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what matters in regard to investment in global environmental protection were discussed at the most recent meeting of G7 Finance Ministers in Washington DC.

Mr. Nelson: None. The meeting focused primarily on the economic situation in the G7 countries.

VAT

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the level of the qualifying turnover for VAT since his Budget statement.

Sir John Cope: The few representations that have been received are divided between those who would like to see the threshold raised significantly in order to exclude many more businesses from the tax and those who seek a much lower or nil threshold in order to minimise what they see as unfair competition for registered traders from those who are not registered.

Family Tax Bills

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on the average family's tax bill of the Budget changes in fuel costs, national insurance contributions, married couples' allowances and excise duties.

Sir John Cope: I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on 22 April at columns 172-78.

Personal Debt

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the level of personal debt in the United Kingdom.

Sir John Cope: Total financial liabilities of the personal sector were £486 billion in the third quarter 1992.

Illegal Alcohol Imports

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what quantity of illegally imported alcoholic beverages have been impounded or confiscated by Customs and Excise officials in the first quarter of 1993;

(2) what estimate he has made, on a weekly basis, of the level of illegal importation of alcohol during the first quarter of 1993; and what his projection of the level was on 30 June 1992;

(3) how many cases Customs and Excise detected in the first quarter of 1993 of people illegally selling alcohol bought elsewhere in the EC at lower excise duty rates and imported into the United Kingdom ostensibly for personal use;

(4) what is his estimate of the percentage of abuse of the indicative level of alcohol and tobacco imports being detected by Customs and Excise officers; and what estimate he has made of the annual loss of revenue resulting from such abuse.

Sir John Cope: Details of detections of imported alcoholic drink illegally offered or intended for sale in the United Kingdom during the quarter ending 31 March are shown in the table.

Beverage	seizures	Quantity litres
Beer	51	47,064
Wine	15	7,385
Spirits	18	860

Any estimates as to the extent of undetected illegal importations would be largely a matter of speculation, but the revenue involved in the detected cases amounts in total to £57,834.

There is no longer any requirement for travellers to declare routinely details of tobacco and alcohol being brought into the United Kingdom from other EC member states for their personal use. Provided the goods are duty paid in the EC country of departure and are intended for personal use, the indicative levels, which function only as a guide, may be legitimately exceeded.

European Monetary Union

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration is being given to ways of delaying the advent of stage 2 of EMU beyond 1 January 1994.

Mr. Nelson: I am not aware of any such consideration. Article 109e of the Maastricht treaty states that the second stage for achieving economic and monetary union shall begin on 1 January 1994.

Trinidad Terms

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the Government have to extend the Trinidad terms on world debt to countries not currently covered by them.

Mr. Nelson: The Paris Club of creditor countries has so far given debt relief on Trinidad terms to 15 of the world's poorest and most indebted countries, 12 of them in sub-Saharan Africa. They include Benin, Bolivia, Ethiopia, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea Republic, Honduras, Mali, Mauritania, Mozambique, Nicaragua, Sierra Leone, Tanzania, Togo, Uganda, and Zambia. Trinidad terms are not intended for better-off but for heavily indebted countries, although I recognise that for some heavily indebted, lower-middle income countries, concessional debt relief may be necessary. Therefore, I welcome the call made by the G7 at the Munich summit to consider the special situation of some heavily indebted lower-middle income countries on a case-by-case basis.

Exchange Rate Mechanism

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the changes in the rates, rules and modus operandi of the ERM since the United Kingdom left the mechanism; and what studies European central bankers have made of its operation and its effects on the level of currency speculation between European currencies.

Mr. Nelson: On 16 September 1992, sterling and the lira were suspended from participation in the ERM and the peseta was devalued by 5 per cent. The peseta was devalued by 6 per cent. along with the escudo, on 23 November 1992, and the Irish punt was devalued by 10 per cent. on 1 February 1993.

There have been no changes in ERM rules over this period.

The European Council, meeting in Birmingham, endorsed the view of Economic and Finance Ministers that the recent financial turbulence calls for reflection and analysis in the light of developments in capital markets and in the European and world monetary systems. It invited Economic and Finance Ministers, assisted by the monetary committee, with the involvement of the Commission, to carry this work forward, with the central bank governors. This work is continuing.

Debtor Countries

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the value to the United Kingdom of debt interest payments from developing countries in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 from (a) payments to the Export Credits Guarantee Department, (b) payments to the Overseas Development Administration, (c) payments to the Commonwealth Development Corporation and (d) in total.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1993]: The following data related to receipts received by each of the agencies from developing countries in the last three financial years. The figures include debt interest paid by Poland, Turkey and Yugoslavia.

ECGD	228·0	338·0	332·0
ODA	5·9	7·9	4·2
CDC	67·0	65·9	86·2
Total	300·9	411·8	422·4

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the value to the United Kingdom of debt interest payments from Zambia in 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 from (a) payments to the Export Credits Guarantee Department, (b) payments to the Overseas Development Administration, (c) payments to the Commonwealth Development Corporation and (d) in total;

(2) what is the current total of outstanding debt owed to the United Kingdom by Zambia.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1993]: The details of individual debtors' positions are confidential to the country concerned. We cannot publish these figures without the consent of the authorities in the debtor countries. However, I can say that at the beginning of April the ODA wrote off £56 million of old aid debts with Zambia. This followed the International Monetary Fund's approval of Zambia's rights accumulation programme.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether negotiations have started for the second stage of Nicaragua's Trinidad terms debt agreement of 17 December 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1993]: Negotiations have not yet started for the second stage of Nicaragua's Trinidad terms debt agreement. Under that agreement, creditors agreed to consider a stock of debt reduction for Nicaragua after three or four years following a period of proven financial and economic responsibility. The Government are continuing to press the Paris Club to agree to earlier action on the stock of debt of the poorest and most heavily indebted countries.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current total of outstanding debt owed to the United Kingdom by developing countries.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 4 May 1993]: The latest figure available for the current total official outstanding debt owed to the United Kingdom by developing countries is £9·67 billion.

Premium Bonds

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 405, if he will give details of the 12 changes made to the premium bond prize fund rate.

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 5 May 1993]: The details are as follows:

Prize fund rate changes

	Per cent.
1 August 1960	4·500
1 September 1968	4·625
1 August 1971	4·750
1 July 1973	4·875
1 July 1974	5·500
1 November 1976	5·625
1 January 1979	5·750
1 July 1980	7·000
1 November 1984	7·750
1 August 1987	7·000
1 July 1988	6·500
1 March 1993	5·000

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Madden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what inquiries he has made into reports of the unauthorised use of a tape recorder by Ministry of Defence police in Pateley Bridge magistrates court on 2 April; what action he has taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I understand that an allegation of unauthorised use of a tape recorder at the court was made to the clerk to the justices and that he has asked the Crown Prosecution Service to investigate. It is not a matter in which it would be proper for me to intervene.

WALES

County Structure Plans

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretry of State for Wales on what dates structure plans have been submitted by each of the eight Welsh counties since they came into existence, indicating which of these have been (a) accepted by the Welsh Office without amendment, (b) accepted subject to specific amendments and (c) rejected.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is set out in the table. All structure plans and alterations approved by the Secretary of State have been the subject of modifications prior to approval. No submitted structure plan has been rejected.

Gwent Replacement[1]	10 February 1992	—

[1] The Gwent Replacement Structure Plan was deposited following the implementation of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in what circumstances he holds any form of public inquiry prior to making changes to a draft structure plan submitted to him by a county in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: As a result of the Planning and Compensation Act 1991, county councils are required, unless the Secretary of State decides otherwise, to hold examinations in public on selected matters arising from structure plans, to provide additional information to help them come to a decision. Previously, when necessary, examinations in public were held on structure plans submitted to the Secretary of State to provide him with additional information necessary for the consideration and approval of the plan.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether county councils in Wales, submitting structure plans for ratification by the Welsh Office, must draw these up in line with uniform national criteria.

Mr. David Hunt: Structure plans prepared under the Planning and Compensation Act 1991 are approved normally by the county council concerned. However, there are requirements to consult the Secretary of State who has powers to direct that a plan be referred to him for approval.

The form and content of structure plans is set out in regulations. In formulating the general policies in structure plans county councils are required to have regard to any regional or strategic planning guidance given by the Secretary of State to assist them in preparation of the plan, and current national policies.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consideration his Department gives to the varying social and cultural patterns in Wales when reviewing structure plans for the counties of Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: Regulations require planning authorities to have regard to social considerations in preparing their general policies and proposals in structure plans. Where appropriate the needs and interests of the Welsh language will be among those considerations. In considering structure plans before him for comment or approval, the Secretary of State takes account of these social considerations.

Children's Hospice

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to fund a hospice for terminally ill children in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The distribution of Government funding and the provision of hospice facilities and other care for the terminally ill is a matter for health authorities, following local discussion and agreement.

Inland Waterways

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken and proposes to take to improve the access, safety and environmental conditions of Welsh inland waterways.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This is a matter for the British Waterways Board.

Palliative Care Services

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the National Council for Hospice and Specialist Palliative Care Services.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No such meeting has yet been sought by the council, but I shall be happy to consider the request if it does so.

Cancer (Drugs)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will extend the drug tariff to assist cancer sufferers.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Secretary of State for Health considers applications from companies to add products to part IX of the drug tariff so that they can be prescribed to patients under the NHS. Products are added to the tariff if they are considered to be safe, cost-effective and of acceptable quality and subject to the availability of resources within the family health services.

Void Properties

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish figures showing the number of void properties in each local authority area of Wales expressed as a percentage of total council stock for each year since 1990.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is given in the table.

Ms Rhiannon Anderton

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to give his ruling in the case of the appeal against Clwyd county council on behalf of Ms Rhiannon Anderton of Mold, Clwyd.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The appeal against the provision specified in Rhiannon Anderton's statement of special educational needs raises a number of complex issues on which my right hon. Friend needs full information from the parties involved before he can reach his decision. The appeal is being dealt with urgently and a decision will be issued as soon as possible.

Welsh Language

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what organisations for grants to support the Welsh language under the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, in the current financial year, were (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful and which, in each category, were concerned with providing information on environmental protection and green issues.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The list of successful and unsuccessful applicants for grant to support the Welsh Language under section 26 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976 in the current financial year is as follows:

Skin Diseases

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of people suffering serious (a) eczema, (b) psoriasis and (c) acne.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not held centrally.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many local authorities in Wales have met the 4 per cent. quota of disabled workers set out in the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944 in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information is given in the table.

Sheltered Workshops

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many sheltered workshops are currently being run in Wales by local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: There are 10 sheltered workshops currently being run in Wales by local authorities. A further workshop is run by a voluntary body acting as an agent for a local authority.

Provision of sheltered employment is primarily a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

A5

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy on the application to make the A5 between Chirk and Llandegai into a heritage route; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend's policy for the A5 is set out in "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s". Present plans are contained in the 1993 supplement to that document.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what schemes have been proposed to improve the A5 from Chirk to Llandegai; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend's plans for major improvements are set out in the 1993 supplement to "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s".

Housing (Special Needs)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a table listing all housing association and other applicants for housing grants or for housing-related grants in the fields of special needs in each of the last five years and in the current year, distinguishing each category of special need referred to, together with the amount applied for and the amount granted in each case in each year in each category.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This information is not readily available.

Planning Decisions

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many decisions by planning authorities in Wales have been revoked by him over the last two years.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Irish Republic (Students)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated cost to public funds for students from the Republic of Ireland now receiving their higher education in Northern Ireland in consequence of European Community agreements.

Mr. Hanley: Information in the form requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, the estimated cost to public funds of tuition fees for students from EC countries, including the Republic of Ireland, holding mandatory or postgraduate awards in the 1992-93 academic year will be about £4·5 million.

Training Centres

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the 1993-94 budget for each of the training centres in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. J. S. Crozier. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. S. Crozier to Mr. Andrew Hunter, dated 6 May 1993:

You have asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for the 1993-94 budget for each of the Training Centres in Northern Ireland.

As Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency (Northern Ireland) the Secretary of State has asked me to reply.

The Training and Employment Agency operates a network of 12 Training Centres throughout Northern Ireland. At this stage in the training year, budgets have not yet been finalised for individual Training Centres as the main recruitment period follows the annual school leaving date in late June.

However, the Public Expenditure Survey allocation for the Training Centres network is:

	£ million
Programme expenditure (training costs, training allowances and related expenditure)	10·957
Capital, including energy efficiency measures	0·704

In addition salaries, travel, subsistance and other administrative costs will be met from the Agency's Running Cost Budget.

However the estimated net expenditure for each Training Centre, including central services costs, in 1992-93 was:

Alfred Street/Leander House	625,200
Ballymena/Ballymoney	2,376,600
Boucher Road, Belfast	2,266,200
Craigavon	1,893,500
Dundonald, Belfast	2,140,000
Enniskillen	1,325,600
Felden	2,207,200
Lisburn	1,547,100
Maydown, Londonderry	1,568,200
Newry/Downpatrick	1,945,900
Omagh/Strabane	1,439,700
Springtown, Londonderry	2,164,700
	21,499,900

Health and Social Services Boards

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will establish an independent staff commission to review and monitor the personnel procedures of the health and social services boards in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Health and personal social services employing authorities are bound by legislation in relation to employment procedures. The management executive of the Department of Health and Social Services monitors their personnel policies, and has particular responsibility for the selection and appointment procedures which apply to all staff in the health and personal social services. It is considered unnecessary to set up such a commission.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total expenditure, including legal costs and compensation payments, incurred by each health and social services board in defending religion and sex discrimination cases over the past three years to 30 April.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 29 April 1993]: Although the total expenditure occurred could be provided only at disproportionate cost, I will write to the hon. Gentleman with details of legal costs and compensation payments when this information has been compiled.

Terrorism

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a list of children, including their ages, who were presumed killed or mutilated by the Irish Republican Army since 1969.

Mr. Mates [holding answer 4 May 1993]: A comprehensive list of persons who have been killed as a result of the security situation in Northern Ireland, Great Britain, Republic of Ireland and mainland Europe, including name, date of death and a brief report of the incident, is currently being compiled and will be placed in the Library in due course. To 31 March 1993, there have been 42 children aged under 14 years killed in Northern Ireland, by terrorists. Sixty-two per cent. of these attacks are believed to have been carried out by Republican terrorists. Information on children injured is not available.

Physiotherapists and Occupational Therapists

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were on the waiting list for occupational therapy in the Down and Lisburn unit of management, Newry and Mourne unit of management and Banbridge and Craigavon unit of management in 1983, 1986, 1989 and at the latest available date.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 4 May 1993]: The information requested is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) occupational therapists and (b) physiotherapists were employed in the Eastern and Southern health and social services boards; and, of these, how many were employed in the Down and Lisburn unit of management, Newry and Mourne unit of management and Banbridge and Craigavon unit of management in each of the years ended 31 March since 1983.

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 4 May 1993]: The number of occupational therapists and physiotherapists employed in the Eastern and Southern health and social services boards, Down and Lisburn, Newry and Mourne, and Banbridge and Craigavon units of management in each of the years ended 31 March since 1983 was as follows:
